INTRODUCTION TO THE WOMEN'S FACULTY CLUB

The first time I entered the Women's Faculty Club was in 1924, when my mother and I came up from San Mateo for lunch with Professor Charles G. Osgood of Princeton. To my sixteen-year-old eyes the club rested on clouds of glory. My knowledge of architectural style was nonexistent, but if pressed for details I would have sworn that it surpassed the Parthenon. Actually I remember nothing but the dining room, which seemed to me marvelously and suitably beautiful, all dark panels and white walls and darker gleaming floors, with chairs and tables stretching into the undefined distance. The food was incomparable, the waitresses exquisite as they floated to the tables, the clatter of dishes symphonically exalting. This was Parnassus.

About thirty-two years later I returned to Berkeley, this time to read in The Bancroft Library. I can't remember where I stayed that summer. I do remember that I was miserably uncomfortable and that The Bancroft's Julia Macleod, whom I had known years before at the Huntington Library, recognized the external signs of my discomfort and said, "Why don't you go over to the WFC and ask Margaret Murdock if there's a room available?" I did not, because my sixteen-year-old's perception of the club was still strong and I was overcome by an attack of quintessential unworthiness.

When I arrived the next summer, Julia telephoned Margaret Murdock directly, and there was indeed room. Miss Murdock welcomed me, and assured me I was not unbearably intrusive, and not committing a heinous crime by planning to stay for all of three months. She furthermore pointed out that I had been given a most desirable room, with a connecting bath and a view of the club's garden, and that I had an extra large closet.

Thus began for me an unbroken and most happy sequence of summer visits, always as long as I could stretch my vacation from teaching American literature at Queens College. Several years later one of the permanent residents said to me, "There are two sure signs of summer here: first the swallows arrive at Capistrano, and then you come in from New York." For me, to eat and sleep at the club, and to read in The Bancroft Library, constituted the ideal life.

My impression of the Women's Faculty Club in 1957 was, first, of all kinds of trees, and of flowers, especially roses and heliotrope. Two Chinese magnolias arched over the stairs, as they do today. A bit of bygone bliss was the large parking lot across the way, in one corner of which grew a beautiful Roman pine. Parking permits were unheard of.

Crossing the threshold, in the office downstairs sat Miss Murdock and Mrs. Gudveig Gordon-Britland. Margaret Murdock seemed to know almost every man, woman, or child who stepped into the place, and she had a comprehensive knowledge of their illnesses and other vital statistics. She and Mrs. Gordon-Britland officiated.

There was no elevator, nor was there a ramp for those who could not, or preferred not to use the stairs. The powder room for women guests was on the second floor, not conveniently on the ground floor as it is today. The west end of the basement was roughly-finished, something like a large cave, a poorly-lighted storage place for miscellaneous objects--chests of drawers, suitcases, trunks, pictures, furniture that members didn't want, and dim bundles of cherished newspapers and magazines from years back.

In those days the club was decorated in a style called "Old Berkeley," which, depending on the eye of the beholder, either meant something pejorative--"dark and dingy," to quote a visiting nun from Chicago--or, to many like me, meant weathered, old-fashioned charm, in some ways out of date, but exactly what was needed. The lounge and library were furnished with some of the treasures that now help to make these rooms outstanding, but then hardly affected the distinctly more bland general effect of that day.

The acoustics of the club were extraordinary. No carpets covered the halls or stairways. If one ascended in the usual fashion one clattered on each step. My first afternoon, as I was going upstairs with my suitcase, someone leaned over the second story railing and shouted, "Less noise! Do you want to ruin those stairs?" To tiptoe was no better; the stairs responded with mighty creaks. Worst of all, occupants of the second story rooms could hear every footstep, soft or loud, in the room overhead, and all too clear were the casual conversations or the typing of one's neighbors to the left or the right.

Nowadays each room in the Women's Faculty Club has its own shower and toilet, but in those days most of the rooms "shared" bathrooms, and on the basis of how cooperative one's bathmate proved to be, lifelong friendships or outspoken animosities resulted.

A wall telephone was located at the end of the hall. Buzzers in each room summoned one to the telephone, or announced the visitor. Here again the splendid acoustics came into play. If a call came after nine o'clock, one knew one was waking the sleeping on that floor, and then some. There was no doubt that every word could be overheard. More than once occupants have been questioned at breakfast about the details of a call that had come in at 9:30 or 10 the previous evening.

However, private telephones could be installed. The summer I got one, the installer in some way also crossed the wires of Dean Davidson's phone with those of a local liquor store. The mishap happened on a Friday and the correction could not be made until the following Monday. Mrs. Davidson was reportedly nearly out of her wits disclaiming her ability to supply the desired brands of gin and scotch to her callers.

In the late fifties the dining room looked very much as it had looked in 1924, the dark tables and chairs, the dark floor. Over near a sunny window stood the Dean's Table, described in several of the interviews here. At a discreet distance was the Family Table, where the "Regulars" sat. When I first went to the club the newcomers sat at one end, and the old guard at the other, but before the summer was over we were somewhat amalgamated. It was quickly apparent that Rule #1 at dinner time was that no one was to sit in May Dornin's chair--the last chair on the left as one looked toward the entrance. This seemingly rigid rule was based on the practicalities of Miss Dornin's left-handedness.

Unwritten Rule #2 was that no one, save a permanent member, was to cut any of the roses. This was because Lucille Czarnowski, a former member of the Physical Education Department, regularly arranged the flowers, and no one but she cut the flowers. (One of her accomplished arrangements can be seen in a photograph in the Treasure Book on display in the library of the club.)* One summer an innocent newcomer did cut a rose that looked the model for a Jackson and Perkins advertisement. A number of us held our breaths until dinnertime when we could learn how that transgressor had survived. (She did.)

The second and third floor kitchenettes each contained rather unsatisfactory refrigerators, not really adequate for storage purposes of any amount, with the result that members' jars of juices, yogurts, stashes of cheese and apples, were inevitably jostled around. Unenforceable unwritten Rule #3 dictated that members' comestibles be clearly kept distinct from each other!

The club manager in those years was Mrs. Lucille Phipps, and liquor in the club was frowned upon. I am under the impression that it was actively discouraged at the Family Table, except on special occasions, but non-residents sometimes brought bottles to their tables. When that happened the waitress rushed for wine glasses and Mrs. Phipps darted forward, corkscrew outstretched. Once a friend and I had guests--and wine--and in the flurry I leaned back and asked Mrs. Phipps if I couldn't save trouble by turning things over to the friendly student-waitress. "No! No!" she replied. "My girls may not even touch a corkscrew, and never a bottle!"

Although I may seem to stress eccentric behavior, eccentricities did not dominate the club. It was quite simply a charming place. I have read in numerous university collections in the United States, as well as in the National Archives and the Library of Congress, and my pleasantest and most congenial summers were spent at the Women's Faculty Club at Berkeley. I have stayed in dorms, hotels, special clubs, and faculty clubs, but I have never stayed in a place where, all in all, there was such general friendliness among a highly diverse and professionally preoccupied group of women.

Mrs. Alfred McLaughlin, who regularly came over from San Francisco for six weeks every summer to "refresh" herself, used to say, "It's the community of spirit that helps do it, and the variety of those interesting women." Several of the permanent residents told me that the regular academic year was a more interesting time--"more prima donnas"--but I recall anthropologists, biologists, chemists, geneticists, historians, nutritionists, librarians, social workers, students of linguistics, a charming expert on urban renewal, a young woman who eventually got a black belt in judo and who reclaimed the nearly extinct Miwok language, graduate students, high school teachers taking refresher courses, and visiting faculty and researchers from France, Germany, Italy, England, Japan, and Russia. Undoubtedly there were others, like the young Persian who spoke very little English but said grandly, "I do not need English. Mathematics is the universal language." Specialists and interested non-specialists met on a common footing and exchanged ideas.

One could go any place alone then. Members enjoyed the walk from the Durant Hotel bus stop up the treelined path to the club. I remember a saunter across the campus at midnight, stopping to look at the moonlit Library and Campanile as well as the shadows in Faculty Glade.

The atmosphere in the club began to change in the early sixties. Some of the pleasantest of the Regulars left the club for retirement homes. It became clear to members who had long believed that they would spend the rest of their lives in the quiet security of this place that they now faced the unsettling fact that they would have to move elsewhere within a few years. Other residents moved from Berkeley for academic reasons. Others became ill and ailing and often didn't come to lunch or dinner.

The student revolution was sweeping this campus, and it exacerbated the emerging temperamental differences between older and younger residents. Two examples will illustrate. One evening at dinner we had to listen to a rancorous denunciation of long hair as worn by men: improper, effeminate, antisocial, and a great deal more. A summer visitor tried to defend this manifestation of delinquency and degradation. The table rocked with argument and the unfortunate defender was in partial limbo for the rest of the week. Another target was the Beatles. Although they had been around for at least seven years, the Beatles suddenly became representative of the decline in American morals. Name any regrettable development of the early 1960s, and a Beatle could probably be found at the bottom of it--unless it was the alleged weaknesses of the university administration, another subject that resulted in monologues of denunciation from several of the Regulars while we summer people sat with eyes glazed.

At various times efforts were made to improve the physical ambience. A major undertaking was the remodeling of the dining room in 1967. When the new dining room was opened the reactions were predictably at odds. Some of the members were delighted, and confessed they had long thought the room cheerless; others thought the change unnecessary, some of the long-time members describing themselves as heartbroken. Indeed, in 1975 when at last the halls and stairs were laid with carpets, red, one of the longtime residents announced that she would never set foot in the club again.

As the student revolution of the sixties progressed, it seemed to me that the resident members of the club became newly aware of their own vulnerability and clearly increasingly fearful for their safety and the safety of the building. In the first years of my stay there it was really a place set apart, hidden in trees and so private that unaware people were often surprised to see it. But now strangers, not remotely academic, seemed to be sleeping in the side garden. Sometimes we could look out and see unauthorized "picnics" (for want of a better word). There were persistent rumors of how unsafe the groves of trees along Strawberry Creek had become. A friend told me that as she was coming through Faculty Glade at noon someone tried to snatch her purse.

The fear of fire became obsessive with some of the permanent residents, and with good reason--there were no overhead sprinklers and no fire sheathing in the building. Fire laws decreed that the windows at the end of the halls on the second and third floor should be closed at night. However these windows opened on fire escapes, and some of the Regulars feared that intruders would come up this way. On hot nights summer visitors' insistence on opening windows caused distress to several of the permanent residents.

Signs on every floor warned residents not to go out by themselves at night, but if possible to go in groups of three. One of the members said to me, "I guess we keep the line to the Campus Police pretty busy." No more midnight strolls across the campus for any of us.

As a summer visitor, I could not know all the inner details of what went on. In addition, between August 1966 and September 1974 I spent a considerable amount of time in Japan, so my visits, when they happened, were brief, but it became increasingly apparent that physically the club was deteriorating badly, that mere patchwork would not help, and that the treasury could not possibly cover the cost of needed rehabilitation.

As the physical condition of the club went downhill, unnerving rumors about imminent dissolution, demolition, or coopting the building grew. Word reached me in Tokyo that the School of Optometry wanted the space occupied by the club for parking places. (The club had already lost its capacious parking place because an addition to Optometry was to be built.) Where roses, heliotrope, lemon verbena, and Chinese magnolias had flourished was now to be a large asphalt parking area--next to the "woodpile" that had been the club. If not that, then we might as well all start looking for boarding houses, because the History Department was surely going to convert the place into carrels. Also the Women's Center caused consternation "The kiddies have taken over the second floor," I learned by letter.

Even before 1966, the rumors included a proposed merger with The [Men's] Faculty Club. One board member said to me, "This place is a tinderbox. If it hasn't already been condemned as uninhabitable, it soon will be. The club can't meet the required budget. We should seriously talk about a merger with the men." Of course the division of opinion on this matter was extraordinary, and passionate.

Efforts to raise funds to meet the budget were inadequate. A distinguished summer resident of many years, stressing that she had long contributed to the university, said, "If they can't afford to run the club, and if the university won't help, the club shouldn't keep up this struggle to exist. But what a tragedy for the dream of Lucy Stebbins." The old argument was heard that the Women's Faculty Club was no longer a club for women faculty. Their absence from the list of club members was ludicrously conspicuous. "Why don't more of them join?" Predictably, the board was criticized.

The prospect of demolition, of having nothing where this true haven had stood for so many years, filled one with a feeling of helplessness and dismay. The sense of desolation was underscored when for financial reasons--the club could not meet the union demand for wages in the kitchen--the club stopped serving dinners in 1971 and the residents, like waifs, went to the men's club where they were shunted to a side porch. Or they ate at a nearby beanery, or they chose to heat soup in an upstairs kitchenette.

The interviews and the appended documents report the worries and the struggles over the issue of merger, an issue that took ten years to resolve fully. Many of the interviewees refer to Peg Uridge. In 1973 Margaret Uridge was elected president of the club, and showed by personal example that that job falls just short of being a 24-hour assignment. Some said, "Oh, Peg has just retired, and the presidency is a godsend for her," but that diminishes unfairly what was true devotion. I remember coming in and finding her sitting downstairs, on a Sunday afternoon when the office was usually locked, typing letters, answering the telephone, and responding when the doorbell rang. She was extremely effective during the negotiations with the men's club, and she worked tirelessly on the complicated job of remodeling the club.

Miss Florence Minard of Mills College was another tireless member. Years later one of her friends said, "Florence did a lot of work, some of it above ground, some of it underground." She wrote letters to all members describing the dangers of the situation and asking for contributions; she devised the Treasure Book, which nowadays is frequently examined by visitors to the club library; and at a dark time when the building had been condemned as uninhabitable, she called in the Berkeley building inspector, took him downstairs, and with him went over the foundation and the rest of the structure, wringing from him the admission that although the building needed fireproofing, it was not in the last stages of collapse that had been represented.*

A great deal of money was urgent, and there seemed to be no way of raising it and no way of saving the Women's Faculty Club. In the nick of time, in 1971--and the interviews again relate more of this--came news of the grant from the Haas family that saved the club.

Although the front elevation of the Women's Faculty Club today looks much as it has always looked, the building that resulted from the renovation is a combination of the old and new. While preserving the best features of the old it has of necessity and also by design introduced improvements that have gone far beyond the simple and economical plan of John Galen Howard. In addition, it admits men to active membership. Thus, not long ago, I was sitting in the lounge and two men walked in. "This is the nicest place on the campus," said one to the other, en route to lunch. Not bad, I thought, for the dream of Lucy Stebbins.

Lucy Ward Stebbins's dream began over sixty years ago, and the oral histories reach back across the decades to remember her. It has been a pleasure for me to go back over the decades in my memories of the club. I have controlled the temptation to chat about special friends at the club, but I want to add something here about four particularly devoted members who are as identified with its existence for me as is the name of its foundress.

*See Appendices.

One dear, kind person was Miss Sarah Davis, small, frail, with precarious eyesight, but cordiality itself, in spite of what I considered notably limited strength. Access into Miss Davis's room was challenging because of a series of ropes or clotheslines which stretched from wall to wall, serving as auxiliary closets and filing cases. On one line hung a few garments, while on the other were notes, letters, and sometimes clippings. One would-be wit and summer visitor said at breakfast, "To get into Miss Davis's room you've got to know the ropes." A freezing silence followed. Miss Davis was a founding member and long the club secretary.

Another kind person with limited strength was Mrs. Harold Bruce, the widow of Harold Bruce of the English Department, and the sister of Walter Morris Hart. She told me that when she was about forty her husband died suddenly. Determined to teach, Dorothy Bruce went to Stanford for her Ph.D. She could have perfectly well have gone to Berkeley, but she thought her late husband's colleagues would be too kind to her academically, and she wanted to earn her degree on her own merits. In spite of her failing health she frequently invited a few fortunate summer residents to her room, where she told numerous stories, and reminisced about the English Department, and her gentle conversation and knowledge of the campus softened the sting of newness for many newcomers. And if there is a heaven, next to her there is her sister-in-law, Amy Bumstead, a person truly kind in the best sense of the word.

But as far as a knowledge of the history of the university is concerned, the two prize winners--in my experience, at least--were Margaret Murdock and May Dornin. The scope of Margaret Murdock's friendships and acquaintances was astonishing. She loved to tell stories, yet was peerlessly modest. Because she played the Campanile bells several times a week, she often played songs in honor of foreign visitors at the club, particularly on the days they were leaving. She was delighted to fill requests to play favorites from Gilbert and Sullivan. Her own oral history is in The Bancroft Library, and her memories of the club are contained herein.

May Dornin, also an interviewee in this oral history, was a walking encyclopedia about the development of the university and the Bay Area. It was only fitting that she was the University archivist. Yet her enthusiasm reached far beyond. She had been a Sierra Club hiker and had gone down the Colorado River at least twice. She was an expert photographer with a beautiful sense of composition. Deeply interested in the history of northern California, she had a vivid chronological sense of what had happened. Her double room at the club was lined with books, and stacks of books stood on the floor. When she started to talk about the university her face lit up. She could tell delightful anecdotes about Benjamin Ide Wheeler, usually presidentially on his horse. She was a devotee of John Galen Howard and fascinating about the history of the landscaping of the campus. She took me once on a tour of the changing neighborhoods of Oakland and Berkeley, from Telegraph Avenue's Sather Gate to Jack London Square, and I could never again look at those squalid buildings with indifferent eyes.

May, like everyone involved in this story of the Women's Faculty Club, loved the university. And like many of us, over the years the love became a love of the memories. Before this tale of a summer visitor becomes too much that, I will stop. But a good oral history interview makes one privy to the moment, and I hope that someone has taped May's description of the funeral of Henry Morse Stephens. Although Henry Morse Stephens died many years earlier, in 1919, May's account of that hushed gathering overflowing Faculty Glade, and of President Wheeler's eulogy, and of the tolling of the Campanile bells, was so graphic that I always felt as if she had just come in from the services. Amen, to history.

INTERVIEW HISTORY

There is no institution at any other great university in this country comparable to the Women's Faculty Club of the University of California at Berkeley. Why that is so has to do with women's "place" at various times, in different ivied halls. The women who founded and supported the concept of a separate women's club at Berkeley were impelled to such action as the result of a grossly misguided denial to them of entry to The (significantly so capitalized) Faculty Club. That rejection galvanized a certain group of women to form a club and build a building.

In October 1923 the Women's Faculty Club moved into newly completed quarters in a comfortable, handsome brown-shingled John Galen Howard-designed home by the waters of Strawberry Creek. Sixty years later that event is still remembered by a few, and the connections to that place on the Berkeley campus for women of the faculty, the staff, and certain community women and scholars from this country and abroad are, as ever, strong and very fond. Whether the club was central to the lives of its members, or peripheral, whether a residence or a place of work, an issue or a cause, it was always a pleasant place to be. A refuge for some, a symbol and a rallying-place for others, when the club's existence was threatened in the Sixties the members really began to know and appreciate it, and each other, in a way they had not before. Now, in 1983, this beautifully-landscaped, authentically old corner of the Berkeley campus is more happily established than ever before, more comfortable, and its oral history is a way of ensuring that the vicissitudes of the years gone by are not entirely relegated to the archives.

The oral history of the Women's Faculty Club was proposed in 1981 with the knowledge that there were available as interviewees club members who were active with Lucy Ward Stebbins, the dean of women and leader among the founders of the club in 1919. The span of interviews was conceived to gather knowledge of the club's past, as well as to develop the chronology of events leading up to the decade which threatened the club's existence as a separate institution on the Berkeley campus. Oral history was particularly well suited to the kind of anecdotal, recollected history-gathering the club had in mind. The interviewees were chosen for their ability to be significant informants, either participants or eye-witnesses. Not just one person or point of view was elicited, and not everything was said, and not everyone heard from, but the eleven interviews together tell a very full story, documentary and personal. The interviewees of course had their own life histories, and for the sake of University of California history, the history of women in academia, and women's history, some biographical material is included.

The experience of doing this oral history was upbeat, cooperative, and complex. It was a grand effort to try to encapsulate so much time and so many people. The interviewees were responsive, concerned to recall, fairly, what they knew, and as the reader will see, reluctant to indulge in blame or hindsight. Each interviewee reviewed her transcript with care. We all look forward to the history being used by scholars, and becoming a dog-eared favorite in the Women's Faculty Club Library. It would be fine if this effort spurred more club members to give their reminiscences to the club historian, as they experience the significance of their institution and its history.

The Women's Faculty Club Oral History was funded as a project of the club, with generous support from Prytanean Alumnae, Inc. Individual donors to the project were Josephine Miles, Mary Ann Johnson, Agnes Roddy Robb, Gudveig Gordon-Britland, and Margaret Mould. We consider it fortunate that historian Helena Maxwell Brewer was willing to delve into her memories to provide an introduction to the club. And I wish to thank the office staff of the club for unlocking the secrets of access to the vault, and for helping in many ways.

The Regional Oral History Office was established to tape record autobiographical interviews with persons prominent in recent California history. The office is under the direction of Willa K. Baum, division head, and under the administrative supervision of James D. Hart, the director of The Bancroft Library.

1) Founding Members and the Building Committee

Smith: One of the reasons that I am a little hesitant about washing any dirty linen in public is I don't think that's politic. The one thing I'm proud of is that in the thirty years in which I was budget officer, nothing ever got out of my office. No raises, no promotions, no questions, no appropriations, no anything! It was just absolutely confidential, as it was supposed to be.

Riess: Well, let's just see what happens. And as I said to you, if you, when you get the record back, want to wash the linen, that's okay.

Smith: Yes, all right.

I was horrified to realize that this year is my fiftieth year in belonging to the club. [Women's Faculty Club] I have an elephant's memory, so I sat down one day and thought about the progress of it. This is the chronological order as I see it.

In the first place, I think the club is unique if you look at particularly other women's faculty clubs: we have always been in the black. Now, there were many, many times when we came awfully near either Scylla or Charybdis, and you never knew where it was going to hit you. But we weathered every storm, and now we are--knock on wood!--financially sound.

Riess: Were you always associated with the budget end of the club? From the beginning?

Smith: It was the budget end of the university.

Riess: But I wondered also whether as soon as you became part of the club, that was an interest of yours.

Smith: No. My interest was in having a quiet place to have lunch. As soon as the pressure became heavier and heavier, I reserved a table permanently by the window, took my Saturday Evening Post, which was then current, and sat there. One of the personnel officers came up to me, and she said, "I'd like to talk business."

Smith: I said, "Oh, no you don't! This is my time. Why, I'll talk business at one o'clock, and not before." So that was that. Everybody understood that I was like--who was it?--Gloria Swanson. "I want to be alone." [laughter]

I was a director of the club for quite a while, but when I got the budget off my neck, then I became most actively interested in the club, and not only was chairman of the finance committee, but then I became treasurer, and then I became the financial advisor because, as I say, figures are my line.

When I retired, which was in 1954--you can see that that was quite some time ago, everybody that I know on the campus is gone, and I don't wish to live forever; I think the Flying Dutchman would be an awful fate!--so when I retired, the auditor that we had, the auditing firm that I had gotten for half price for the club, [Goodell and Henry] had so much business that he moved to Oakland and could no longer take care of us, so I said, "Well, might as well put what I've done to use," so I audited the books for nearly ten years.

At that time, Margaret Murdock had taken over the management of the office. She, of course, had the very first knowledge of the club, because she was Miss [Dean Lucy] Stebbins' assistant before the club was established. She knows all the beginning. I think she was there in 1919, and 1919 was the date in which I began my university service.

Riess: And you joined the club in 1931, you said earlier?

Smith: Yes.

Riess: And why hadn't you considered joining it before then?

Smith: Because I didn't think it was necessary. At that time, the academic atmosphere prevailed, and the administrative people were on sufferance sort of. Not exactly on sufferance, but there were not so many of them. I'll come to that in the beginning. This is the prologue.

If you look at the record of other clubs, and particularly women's clubs, I don't think you're going to find that they had the financial record that we have. I told you about always being in the black. Long before ERA, and all the publicity they got. The club was established on the same principles.

Dean Stebbins was a wonderful example of the iron fist in the velvet glove. She had an iron will, and she appeared very sweet on the surface. But she was determined to get what she wanted, and when she was told that the men's club, The Faculty Club (capitalized), had no place for women, and did not want them, that was it.

Riess: There were other early faculty women, like Jessica Peixotto, and Agnes Fay Morgan. Why was it that Dean Stebbins took charge? Why do you think she was the one?

Smith: That I don't know. I knew Miss Stebbins very well, because she just lived a little ways down on Durant, and when I walked down to go shopping, she always invited me in, or she was out on the porch and I stopped. So in addition to what I knew of her in the club, I came to know her personally very well.

I don't know why, except--to use the vernacular--she got her back up, and probably at the way in which the then president of The Faculty Club told her they did not want women, and had no place for them. I think Margaret Murdock said that this happened the first time that The Faculty Club extended their building. You see, Maybeck did the Men's Faculty Club, and John Galen Howard did ours.

Although the Academic Senate denied the statement, it was commonly known on the campus that they did not want women on the staff. I think that is another thing that--

Riess: On the staff! But they already had them on the staff.

Smith: I know, but they did not want to advance them.

Riess: I see, or encourage them in any way.

Smith: Or encourage them. At that time there was a list of very famous women on the campus. Who was there? Miss Stebbins, Agnes Fay Morgan, Mary Patterson, Jessica Peixotto, Pauline Sperry, and later--

Riess: Who was Pauline Sperry? I don't know that name.

Smith: Mathematics. She may have been a little later than the rest of these.

Also later, there was Sophia Levy, who achieved, I think, national recognition that wasn't given to her by the University. She was given a leave of absence, and was put in charge of the mathematics training of the Air Force men in calculus for navigation.

Riess: Isn't that interesting? Women in mathematics--that's a bit of a tradition there.

Smith: And Pauline Sperry was in mathematics, and very good. Here's an example of the way women were treated. Pauline Sperry's friend was Alice Tabor, who was an instructor in German, very thoroughly scholarly person who did an outstanding job. She did not publish. Pauline Sperry went many times to the Academic Senate, when Miss Smith: Tabor's people got recognition, and pointed out that simply because she did not publish, did not do research, she was held back. Poor Miss Tabor stayed an instructor in German the rest of her academic career. That's one reason why I was so interested in the findings of this committee--I don't know its formal name.* Even now, women are $1700 per annum less than their masculine counterparts. Well, that's that.

Oh, say, the women that have achieved distinction, the two women that have received distinction in the club and been given the position of Faculty Research Lecturer are Agnes Fay Morgan, and Josephine Miles. [telephone rings; brief tape interruption]

Dr. Morgan was the first one. [Faculty Research Lecturer] She was very concerned. I knew Dr. Morgan very well. Although she had often given reports personally to the Regents, and even several times exhibits of her nutrition research, she said she had nightmares before the lecture. She thought how awful it would be if nobody came. She was very much on pins and needles, but when the time came there was an overflow audience.

Riess: You've mentioned a lot of people who were on the first board. There were a couple of other names: E.M. Coulter.

Smith: Oh, yes. Edith Coulter, Dr. Coulter. I guess she had a Ph.D. She was the first president of the Building Committee. She was a professor of librarianship.

Riess: And Sarah Davis, and her campus address was Hearst Hall. She was in the Physical Education Department?

Smith: Yes.

Riess: And Fancher in home economics?

Smith: Helen Fancher.

Riess: And Agnes Fay Morgan. Mary Patterson was in home economics also?

Smith: Yes. There was a Department of Household Science first. It consisted of the two heads, Agnes Fay Morgan, and Mary Patterson. They did not get on together because their aims were entirely different. Dr. Morgan was engaged in research in nutrition, in which Miss Patterson was not interested. Miss Patterson was very artistic,

*Committee on Senate Policy, 1982.

Smith: and was interested in household science. So they agreed to split, and made two departments: the Department of Nutrition and the Department of Household Arts.

By the way, Miss Patterson did the seal that we [Women's Faculty Club] use. I discovered it in the vault. I think Margaret Murdock told me about it. I took it out, and printed it, and was so enamored of it that I put it on the letterhead, and everyone fell for it. Now we have it spread all over the place: the dishes, etc.

Riess: It's a very nice monogram.

Smith: Yes, isn't it? I think it is beautiful. That is symbolic of Mary Patterson's work.

Riess: Just to back up again, before Lucy Stebbins brought the women together to talk about a club, do you understand that there was an informal manner of meeting of women?

Smith: That I don't know. Now, Margaret Murdock could tell you that. You see, she knows all those things.

Riess: As a young administration person on campus, what was your view of the women in the Women's Faculty Club?

Smith: The academics were snobby.

Riess: So it was another world.

Smith: It was another world. That brings me to the second year of the club. At that time, it was set up, either Miss Stebbins or the Board of Directors--I can't remember who all the Board of Directors were. On your list, if you put in Helen Fancher, you should put in Margaret Beattie, who was in hygiene. And there are some more gaps in there.

Riess: The seven-member board in 1919 was what I was looking at.

Smith: But I'm thinking about 1922, '23. To go back a couple of years to the beginning. Dr. Morgan said they probably made her president because she was the only person who would be tough enough to tell anybody off. Those are her exact words to me. I don't think they better be published.

There were two separate clubs at that time: the Building Committee, which had its separate president, and its separate board of directors, and which owned the building, which made itself liable for the mortgage and had everything to do with the building; and then the club proper. The first year, only persons of academic rank were eligible. That did not pay.

- Smith: Dr. Morgan saw that the life of the club would be very short to depend on that. So she insisted that they raise the dues, and invite the persons at the head of the administrative staff of the departments. I was invited at that time along with every other secretary or administrator of that category, and did not see any reason why I should belong.
- Riess: In fact, they even had an associate status for people outside the University, didn't they?
- Smith: Yes. They thought that that would add a little glory, and took in people such as Mrs. Baldwin Woods--no, she came in later. Anyway, they had various people that would add glory to the club.
- Riess: In fact, was it to gather in some faculty wives, is that what you're suggesting?
- Smith: I think so.
- Riess: So Agnes Fay Morgan had to be strong enough to face down what particular group of people? People within the club?
- Smith: At that time, there was a lot of--I don't know whether it's feminine jealousy, or just that feminines couldn't get along. There was a lot of nasty little fights. Dr. Morgan just said what was what, what they could do. That's how administrative people got into the club. As you look over the roster now, it's ninety-nine and 9/10 percent administrative, and not faculty. You have an awful time to interest the faculty. I have found that they look down their noses at the administrative group.
- Riess: Historically, but not any more.
- Smith: Well, I don't know. I haven't been on the campus lately, so I don't know what the attitude is.

Another point that I think--what was I going to say?

- Riess: I was going to ask you about this division between the Building Committee and the club itself. One was in the service of the other?
- Smith: The Building Committee, being responsible for the mortgage, held the reins. Miss Edith Coulter was chairman of the Building Committee, or the president of it, for ages and ages.
- Riess: But I thought that was a committee that was supposed to dissolve as soon as--
- Smith: Well, that didn't dissolve until the mortgage was paid.

Riess: And until the mortgage was paid, power in the club?

Smith: They owned the building, and the club paid rent to them, which were their funds to pay on the mortgage.

I know the point that I wanted to make. It isn't particularly apropos at this time. But you take an academic person, or a busy administrative person, they don't have time to give to the affairs of the club as they should. The most successful people have been the administrative people. In looking back over the various presidents, I think the two presidents that have done the most for the club are Ruth Donnelly, who had charge of the housing committee, and Margaret Uridge, who, as you know, was the reference librarian for the university. Ruth Donnelly only was able to do that when Mrs. Davidson released her from some of her duties in the dean of women's office. The club was in very great financial danger at that time, and Mrs. Davidson thought that this might be the only way to meet the very critical situation. Mrs. Davidson felt justified in doing this since the club is legally acknowledged as "an integral part of the university."

Finally when the mortgage was paid, there was just one organization. You see, before that the club paid $250 every month to the Building Committee, and any more, if it were possible, which it wasn't. So by those very small steps, we finally ended all obligation. We burned the mortgage in the fireplace and had quite a celebration.

Riess: I notice that the Building Committee set it up so that one quarter of the financing was in stocks, and the rest was in bonds. What happened to the stockholding aspect of that?

Smith: I don't know. Although at that time, when it was closed, I think I was the chairman of the Building Committee. But I can't answer that. I just don't know. I doubt if anybody does! [chuckles] Anyway, that's that.

Then time went on after that, it was financially peaceful.

Riess: Was the Building Committee an elected committee every year?

Smith: Yes.

Riess: Was it, in fact, the most powerful?

Smith: Yes, I think so, although of course each committee thought it was the more powerful. But really, since they owned the building, I think that they were the more powerful.

Miss Coulter, as I say, reigned for many years as chairman of the Building Committee. She was a bit autocratic, but I think that a chairman has a right to be autocratic.

Riess: In all of those years, did the issue of joining with The Faculty Club ever come up?

Smith: No, not yet.

Riess: That was not a recurrent theme over the years.

Smith: No.

2) Managing the Club

Smith: The cook who served so long was Mrs. Mabel Battle. I think the meals were just like home cooking. I ate there day after day and never tired of it any more than you tire of what you have at home. Mrs. Battle finally reached the age of retirement and the club took meals from the ASUC, the student service. It was very unsatisfactory; the organization was very hard and arbitrary to deal with. The meals came on a cart, and one time the cart upset, and there was no dinner. So that didn't prove a success.

Then the club hired a cook from the union, and tied an albatross around their necks, because the union had certain requirements, and the union had regular salary increases. Finally it ended up that the cook got more than the manager of the club. "The cook must have a helper, who served so many hours," and so on.

Riess: How many meals was the cook responsible for?

Smith: The club served breakfast for the residents in the little dining room. (I think it has another name now, but anyway, that's what we called it.) The cook was responsible for lunch and dinner. And dinner was the one that always put us in the red, because everyone went home, particularly the faculty went home, and didn't want to come out again.

In the early days many of the faculty just met their wives and had dinner there, and it was very pleasant. It declined and declined until dinner became a Jonah.

Riess: You're saying that for a while there were men faculty that were meeting their wives there?

Smith: Yes. I can remember Mr. Allen, who was professor of Greek, always met Mrs. Allen at certain times, and they very often had dinner there.

Riess: It was because she was a member.

- Smith: Yes. You could bring a guest. But they weren't free to come over of themselves, as they are now.
- Riess: Was the lunch a lunch, or was it a dinner-type lunch?
- Smith: It was a rather substantial lunch. Dinners used to be very nice.
- Riess: But it was only lunch that you had when you were there, wasn't it?
- Smith: Yes.
- Riess: I've read in the history that originally Miss Stebbins had Miss Ransom as manager. Was that of Ransom and Bridges School? Is that the same woman?
- Smith: Yes. That was she. She was the first person that I remember as manager of the club. She was a very gracious manager, and it was very successful. Then there have been other managers, successful, unsuccessful, gracious and non-gracious.
- Riess: Tell me a little bit more about the role of the manager. Is she to be a hostess?
- Smith: Yes. A sort of a hostess in general over the club and its activities. Now we have, you might say, a sub-hostess of the dining room, whose duty it is to see that everything is correct, and who takes care of anything special or so on. I think the club have been very fortunate. Mrs. Uridge got Mrs. Rockwell, who is a friend of hers, as manager. And she, aside from Miss Ransom, to my mind, rates the highest of any manager we've had. We've had a modern person, very modern, as manager; we've had a conservative person; and we've had temperamental managers, and so on.

The office was usually taken care of--who kept the books first? When Margaret Murdock was no longer president of the club--I know, we had Amy Bumstead, who was the accountant for the ASUC, as the chief accountant. She did all the football and so on for the ASUC; at that time, that was a million-dollar business. Miss Bumstead took hold of our accounts and brought them all into shape, and everything was wonderful. She reached the age of retirement, or she had retired from ASUC, and I forget what happened--her husband died--she no longer could manage the accounts. So Margaret Murdock, after being president, took over charge of the office.

That was when I audited the books. I don't think it was for quite ten years, but it was a long, long period. I saved the club several thousand dollars by doing it. It was no effort for me; I was very familiar with the procedure and everything, so I made all the annual reports and did that. It isn't that I did it: I was just there, and just able to do it.

Riess: Yes. It made sense.

Smith: I don't want any emphasis on the first personal pronoun singular.

I was very interested that Margaret, whose title, before she had retired, was Credentials Counselor in Education--she counseled all those who graduated from the Department of Education--should have shown such an accurate aptitude for figures. I have only seen one other person that could compare with it. In all those years that I did that, she made one mistake, and it was seventy-five cents. I spent more time chasing that seventy-five cents than I would $75,000! [laughter] But she managed it most efficiently. It was under her that Mrs. [Gudveig] Gordon-Britland succeeded her. She had trained her.

Riess: Were these volunteer positions?

Smith: No. Margaret objected to taking money; she said she didn't need it and she would work for the club for something like $300 a year, which is $25 a month. Mrs. Bumstead was a paid position. I don't know what it is now. I have no longer any means of knowing.

Then there came another president. I was still treasurer of the club. I don't know whether I should say this or not, but I was greatly irked. We had a Frenchman and his wife, and his name was [Gaston] Abbo. He looked very good at the beginning, but things, to my mind, were heading straight for bankruptcy.

Riess: A Frenchman and his wife?

Smith: He was manager of the club, and she supervised the kitchen. Theoretically, it was a wonderful combination. But actually, as I say, it brought the club to the brink of bankruptcy.

I was treasurer at that time, and I was very unpopular because I kept howling "wolf." They said it was not the case, but the figures remained that way. I spent quite a bit of thought in various ways of saving money and recommendations to be made. And the president at that time of the club did not see--I wrote the recommendations out and gave them to the secretary of the Board of Directors to include in the minutes, but never once did they appear! So I thought since that was the case, it was no use wasting my time any more, and I resigned as treasurer. Not from the club, but as treasurer.

Riess: What year was this?

Smith: Oh, Lord, I don't know. Well, I think if you can find out what year Margaret Thal-Larsen was president--maybe somebody in the office would know what year it was. [1967-1969]

Riess: Did your suspicions in fact prove correct?

Smith: I know at one time we had a balance of sixty dollars. I could make no impression on several people who were very much in favor or were very taken by the Frenchman and his wife.

Riess: I suppose they thought that was classy, to have a Frenchman and his wife? Was it that?

Smith: Yes, it added eclat. [laughs]

Then there was--of course there was one Board of Directors by that time. I guess I still must have been on the Board of Directors. They were a new bunch, and terribly modern, and the house--they said this was a worn-out building, and some people talked, I don't know whether in joke or not, of tearing it down and building another one. This was the beginning, you see, of the talk of joining with the men's club.

Riess: Are you talking about the late sixties now?

Smith: It was about 1967, '68. It was around in that locality--the late 1960s.

One of the older members, Mrs. Samuel May, Bernice May, was very insulted that it was called an old building, all run-down, and we needed new all over. So because she was on the city council, she got the city inspector of buildings, Mr. Atkins, to come up and review the condition of the building.* He said--there is a letter in the file somewhere; I have seen the letter--he said that the building was in absolutely sound condition. The foundations were as good as when they were put in; the structure of the building had not notably deteriorated; perhaps some of the wiring could be improved. But if he were asked his opinion, he would say it was in excellent condition.

Riess: That's very interesting. This modern board, what was the composition of it?

Smith: You mean names?

Riess: I mean names, or I mean were they more academic than administrative? Did they have some particular reason to throw over the Women's Faculty Club?

*December 14, 1970. See Appendices.

Smith: Oh, no. They were administrative. One was in the office of the attorney for the Regents. The attorney was at that time--let's see, who was it? It was before [Donald L.] Reidhaar--I can't think who was the attorney.

Riess: Maybe it's not names that I want. I want to know why there was that feeling at that time.

Smith: It was due to a very modern manager. That's shown in the matter of--well, how can I best illustrate it? When we first served anything but water, tea or coffee, it was sherry. Ruth Donnelly and I went to Dean Stebbins and said, "How would it be if we had a pre-dinner hour, a sherry hour, and we raised the money for it so that it did not come out of the club's money." Dean Stebbins said it was a fine idea. So we proceeded. We had several remarks from some moss-bound people, but we proceeded and served sherry at the annual dinner. At the next annual dinner we established the "Sherry Hour."

With this modern manager, who had permission to employ her husband, we served cocktails. And believe me, they were very strong cocktails, too. They were overloaded with brandy. I can take two cocktails, but beyond that I don't usually go. These cocktails, when I had one, I'd had more than the equivalent of two. Two people came to disgrace that night, which didn't please me at all. I thought it cheapened the club, particularly as the invited guests were President [Charles] Hitch and Chancellor [Roger] Heyns and their wives, and the occasion was the bestowal of the Centennial honors.

Riess: The modern people were people who were trying to make the club popular at all costs, is that the idea?

Smith: Yes. Now, one thing, we had an art show, and took the living room, and turned it into screens with an exhibit of pictures, and everybody dressed up, and it was a big success. That was one thing to their credit. But otherwise the attitude was very much modern, and "we'd been in the back woods all the time." I was not in favor of that attitude, nor of the way in which the Frenchman was hired.

After the previous manager had left due to ill health, we got a housemother from one of the sororities. I thought that that would be a good idea, that she would be sort of hardened to things and requests and so on, and would know how to deal with it. She thought the job was a walkover, and so easy she didn't need to give it any attention, with the result that she didn't do what a couple of members of the board had asked, so she was out of favor.

Then this Frenchman and his wife turned up, and even before she had completed a month, she was dismissed! I did not care for that way of doing business. I abstained from voting, because I didn't approve of getting someone, and not even letting her finish a month before being urged out the door to welcome a Frenchman who had no conception of finances.

Smith: And that was when, as I say, I made recommendation after recommendation where you could save money or where you could cut corners, and so on, and they never even appeared in the minutes.

Then, it ended up I think at one time where I know that we only had sixty dollars leeway. That, to me, meant we were certainly on the verge of bankruptcy. The policy at that time was to keep all financial matters from the members. I think somebody got hold of the fact that the club was not doing well financially, and that's when the first inkling came of joining with the men's club, who had an immense debt to the Regents.

3) Residential Members

Riess: In the midst of all of this, do the people who live there, the residents of the club, do they represent a whole separate voice?

Smith: No. No.

Riess: Do they get involved in these issues?

Smith: No, because they don't know about it. That was my main point. They didn't know that we were just on the verge of bankruptcy.

Riess: Traditionally, the people who have just used it as a living club have not been involved in the running of it?

Smith: No, they have not become involved in the government or the administration of the club at all. Unless several of them get together and talk to the president or talk to the Board of Directors and so on. Some of those things can be quite ticklish, quite sticky.

A long time ago, from the beginning until about this time, there used to be what was called the Family Table. All the residents sat at the Family Table. They were mostly the academics; they stuck together and looked down upon the administrators.

Riess: That's who was living there mostly, women faculty members?

Smith: A lot of them were that way. Some were--it's hard to tell when the administrators took over almost entirely. Say, for instance, Miss Coulter always sat at the Family Table, and she had all her minions, too. Then all the other people that were there--if the academics came in from outside, naturally, their friends were academic and they sat there. But there was great feeling--I know, not because I had any feeling, I didn't care, but a friend of mine who was partly

- Smith: academic--she was curator of birds in the museum of vertebrate zoology--she felt that the academics set themselves up and looked down on the rest. So she never sat at the Family Table. Maybe that's horrid to say; maybe I shouldn't say that.
- Riess: Then the real life of the club was as a lunch club for administrative people.
- Smith: Yes. As I look back on the personnel at lunch time, ever since I can remember, more than half have been administrative people. One remark from a person in an agricultural extension, who isn't necessarily a classicist, said that the administrative people were very stupid. Why should they--what did they want to have lunch with them for? Now, that's the kind of feminine--I don't know what it is--feminine attitude I cannot stand. I don't like women awfully well, per se. I grew up with boys; either you punch the other fellow in the nose or you get punched. But you don't make remarks like that. That is, to my mind, the worst thing that I know about the club. Every now and then it comes out. I have been the subject of it, and I don't care for it.

4) Arrangements with the Men's Club

- Smith: Anyway, this was the beginning, when we had the sixty dollars--this was the beginning of talking with the men's club [The Faculty Club]. I didn't see the necessity of joining with the men's club. Even by that time, the men could eat over at our club, and we could eat over there for a long time, and write the chits. So I can't see any reason why even a man-crazy person should want to go over to the men's club when they could anyway. What's the use of joining the club? Why not leave them separate? In addition, the aims and purposes of the two clubs are entirely different.
- Riess: Was it the academic people who wanted to pull out and go to the men's club?
- Smith: Not especially. It was more the administrative people.

So there came a confrontation, and it was put to a vote, and the Board of Directors agreed to join the men's club. Mr. Henry Poppic, who was an attorney in the city of Berkeley, very prominent in city council affairs, was the first honorary masculine director--he was honorary director, of the Women's Faculty Club. He told Ruth Donnelly, and she told me, and she was very careful at repeating what someone else had said--not distortion, not her idea, but actually what the person had said. She said that the reason that she agreed is that Poppic told her that the joining would be on the basis of membership fee, and that the vote would be comparable--the women would have a vote.

Smith: The next day after that meeting with that decision, I happened to have something to take care of in regard to bills or to the accounts or something. Anyway, I went over to the club about ten or half past ten in the morning, and there was the manager of the men's club, The Faculty Club, proceeding to roll up our rugs preparatory to taking them over to The Faculty Club.

[To get an idea of those rugs] my friend and I happened to be going to auctions, and at that time everybody was having wall-to-wall carpets, so beautiful rugs were [being] thrown out. There was this old-style Sarouk, which was very large--these [looking at her own carpets] are what, eight by ten, one like this. The Sarouk, the main rug, I think was about eleven by sixteen. I don't remember the exact measurements. But do you know, I got it for $167.

Riess: No!

Smith: It is now worth thousands of dollars. When I looked at it, it didn't have a brack in it; it was in perfect condition. It was a lovely rug. The old style Sarouks are not made anymore. It was the most wonderful bargain we ever got. I forget now--I was told what it's appraised at.

I also got that little Shiraz that used to be in the library at auction at a very reasonable price. Then there were the two rugs that I had--our rug man made me a very good price on those Hamadan runners.

Here was this manager [Chuck Walters], whom Ruth Donnelly and the then president of the club had recommended, rolling up the big rug to take it over to The Faculty Club. I hit the ceiling. I told him that I was a member of the board, that he had no right to touch the things which were our furnishings. And in the first place, he was doing it unauthorized. He could just roll the rug back and just go home and stay there. He was, to me, a very obnoxious person, particularly in taking action such as this was without authorization. As soon as Mr. McAbee retired, things went from bad to worse.

Riess: He had been the manager of The Faculty Club?

Smith: Mr. McAbee had been the manager of The Faculty Club for years and years.

This person Ruth Donnelly, and the then president, who is a most intimate friend of mine, thought he would do because he'd been in the restaurant business. He was very uncultured, though that isn't a necessary qualification, but he was that kind of a person. The office reflected his attitude: they were very rude when the representative of our office went over to straighten accounts. They in fact, got our accounts in such a mess, and did not collect. So that was the reason that this first agreement to join was discontinued.

Smith: We had a set of brand new dishes, and they took them over; all the cute little teapots had their noses broken off and their covers lost. They took over our complete set of silver, which was scattered to the seven winds of heaven.

But the thing that I was anxious to preserve were all the objects d'art that Albert Bender had given the club. He was most generous. His affections were divided between Mills College and the Women's Faculty Club. All that beautiful gold carving was given by him, so many things were given, and I thought if they start on the rugs, I guess they'd take those things over, which was one of the reasons that I objected strongly, and I guess violently.

Anyway, they made such a mess of the accounts that other people began to see it, and stopped that. I don't know how much money we lost not being collected. There was no follow-up. That's the way the men's club operates. I found out afterwards their uncollected bills were really something.

5) The Vote Not to Merge

Smith: My point of view is the office, of course, the figures, the basis of the living of the club. So came the second time [move to merge]. I guess it simmered. A lot of people kept it alive, and I'm sure they did not know the circumstances. I would have broadcast them, but I was not in the position to do anything then.

Then we came finally to the committee that was appointed by Chancellor Heyns. I've forgotten who was on the committee; it doesn't matter. The treasurer of the Women's Faculty Club at that time campaigned violently for the merger. There were many, many members that wanted it. They were in the secretarial range. In fact, several of them said that they would resign from the club if this merger didn't go through. There was great talk about building the glass passageway between the two clubs.

It was just about accomplished. The husband of a very intimate friend of mine, who was Lawrence's right hand man at the Radiation Laboratory, told me that the men's club had just issued an assessment of twenty dollars per member to have to make up the deficit in their interest on their immense loan. It started out with $45,000 and extended upward, I don't know at what rate.

Anyway, it's none of my business, and I did not make any effort to find out--although I could find out--the amount of their loan. But it was enough so that it was serious, and their bookkeeping was

Smith: terrible, and they didn't follow-up on unpaid bills, so that they were in such a hole that every member of The Faculty Club was assessed twenty dollars. My friend at the Lawrence Radiation Laboratory was very irate about that, and he was more irate when I told him several circumstances of what had happened. So he said, well, why didn't I do something about it?

Well, after having been invited by an unauthorized person "to stay home and stop trying to run the club," I had done just that. In other words, I had already been the subject of public vilification, which goes off my back like water. I don't care. I was a little bit hesitant to make for any further mudholes, but I was against the campaigning of the treasurer of the club for the merger, and I finally decided that I would see what happened.

I got the annual report [of The Faculty Club] made by Haskins and Sells, that audits the university account. There, on the top of page three, among the income listed, was an item "Women's Faculty Club, $898" (or $848, I don't remember which). (This sum, by the way, was the exact amount which The Faculty Club was short in meeting their interest on their loan. And this was in spite of the general assessment of twenty dollars levied on all its members.)

I can remember the three questions which immediately arose in my mind on seeing this entry: first, was this a case of barefaced effrontery in including OUR money without our authority? second, or had some officer of the club given permission to use this sum although no formal agreement of the merger had been signed? and third, by using a flat sum, such as this, all promised consideration of membership fees, etc. no longer existed. Also, I could not see why such a well known firm as Haskins and Sells would accept as revenue an amount from a separate organization without checking the authorization for it.

I considered this very seriously and decided that in spite of probable unhappy consequences I should no longer stay aloof. With permission from the president of our club, Peg Uridge, I decided to issue a statement of facts so that the members might see the merger from a more practical viewpoint. I titled the letter "A Financial Warning."* I pointed out that if the merger went into effect, our club would be open to arbitrary assessment at any time; that we would lose all control over our own money, our two donations ($25,000 from Mrs. Mel and $2,500 from Miss Mabel Coulter); we would not only lose our identity but lose control over all our accounts and probably lose our most desirable furnishings as well. The incident of taking our rugs in the first attempt at merging showed very plainly what would happen.

*Appended

Smith: I had this letter xeroxed and, again with permission, took advantage of the campus mail. The postage on the non-campus addresses was paid by me personally.

At a general meeting of the club before voting on the merger I stated the facts as I saw them. As an aside, I should like to say that I cleared the treasurer of giving any possible authorization for use of our funds. The surprise with which she protested my calling attention to the $898 inclusion of our funds showed that the realization of what the report indicated hadn't even percolated.

I ended my talk with the feeling that I had spread out all the facts in a plain and clear fashion so that the members could consider the merger with the knowledge of what had happened in the past and what could and would happen in the future. Doris White, a member of the Board of Directors at the time, tape-recorded the meeting, so that any point in question can be verified.

As a result of the decision NOT to merge, fifteen members resigned as threatened.

That was that. The rest of the members, we went on with new vigor. Mrs. Uridge had gotten Mrs. Rockwell for a manager. We had just gone back to the happy, friendly feeling that the club was started with. And it's in wonderful financial condition.

Riess: Now, why is it in actually "wonderful" financial condition? I can see how you reversed a trend that had left you with sixty dollars at one time.

Smith: The club was renovated with money to make it earthquake proof--you know, the earthquake money that was spread all over the campus. And we got a beautiful donation from a Mrs. Mel, Cora Mel. She was an old Berkeley resident. She was very interested musically. Every concert I went to, we always saw Mrs. Mel.

She gave $25,000 for improvements, special things to make the rooms more livable. They've at last come to appreciate oriental rugs. You see, a daughter of one of the first professors of agriculture, Mr. Hilgard, Alice Rose Hilgard, left all of her oriental rugs to the club. They were just stuck in the closet. But being a hobby, why, I got other people interested, and now I think the club looks the way it should, and the friendly atmosphere is wonderful, and the food is good. Mrs. Rockwell had the foresight to grab the cook up at Cowell Hospital. When the cook at Cowell resigned, Mrs. Rockwell immediately said how desirable we were.

6) The Club as a Forum

Riess: As I read histories of the club over the years, I saw that periodically there would be an effort to make the club a place where women's issues would be discussed.

Smith: Yes. Well, that was Miss Stebbins' original thing to start out: to give women academic recognition. And also to make it a home for the foreign scholars who come over to this country. I have a friend who is at the University of Upsala, and she is Finnish. She has had three Guggenheim fellowships. She stayed at the club. Many people that come over stay at the club, all the people that get foreign grants.

Riess: I noticed that. I noticed that one of the committees--I think it was in the early sixties--was called the Professional Advancement Committee.

Smith: Yes. Anna Espenshade was chairman, I think.

Riess: Can you say anything about that?

Smith: Well, it is rumored that at a meeting of the Academic Senate ages and ages ago one member said in plain English, out loud, that they didn't want women. They would prefer men.

Riess: The Professional Advancement Committee seemed to be looking into women's salaries; they wanted to know whether this year we had more women than we had last year. Yet, at the same time, the tone was that even if we found out, we have no power to recommend anyway.

Smith: Yes. Or to be listened to. And there had been, over the years, I think three different committees for advancement of women in academic fields. Every one of them has petered out just like that.

I should think not until this last--I don't know who appointed this last one, whether it was Saxon or whether it was Heyman. But it's a committee of about five years--this last one is the only one in my fifty years of knowledge that has published a certain definite conclusion.

Riess: It's probably because they were required by the government, in order to get money, to come up with the information.

Smith: That could be, that could very well be.

Riess: How about having an academic atmosphere insofar as having women talk about research they were doing? Was there an effort to have evening talks that were educational, or lunchtime talks in those days?

- Smith: I don't think they would draw very much. Marian Diamond, who was very enterprising, furnished slides of some of her research. The audience was very small. On the contrary, a long time ago, when Mary Ann Johnson was president, and I had something to do with the ceremonies, we had Hope Gladding give slides of the English country houses. And the place was packed! So I don't know whether that would attract people now or not.
- Riess: Do you have the feeling that the Men's Faculty Club is really a lively institution itself?
- Smith: I am in no position to say anything, because all the men I knew in The Faculty Club are not there anymore.
- Riess: Do you think it had a real heyday?
- Smith: Yes. Its opinions held an important place on the campus. I don't think the measure of the present faculty is anywhere near what it was with all of the people that we used to have.
- Riess: You mean, the measure of active members?
- Smith: Yes.
- Riess: That's exactly what I was trying to find out: as a body, whether it had an opinion that was listened to.
- Smith: I shouldn't express any opinion, because I'm not on the campus anymore; I've avoided all campus gossip.
- Riess: I'm talking about when you were.
- Smith: Yes. When I was, people like [George D.] Louderback, and--what was the chemistry man?
- Riess: Lewis?
- Smith: Yes, old G.N. Lewis, and so on. All my friends--[Joel] Hildebrand and lots of other people of the same caliber, they really had a place.
- Riess: That reminds me to ask you whether the Women's Faculty Club was particularly buzzing during the loyalty oath years. Around those issues, what happened at the club?
- Smith: Nothing much.
- Riess: The club doesn't take stands?
- Smith: No.

Riess: As a Board of Directors, you don't take a stand?

Smith: No.

Riess: Have there ever been Boards of Directors that have tended to be more political?

Smith: No, I don't think so. I think any Board of Directors at that club is decidedly a-political. I'm a-political.

Riess: Okay. Well, I think we've done a good job.

Smith: To me, that was a rather interesting chronology.

Riess: Very. And particularly since it's such a happy outcome.

Smith: Yes. Usually--[pause] I wouldn't wish the personal element that I say what happened to me or what I did, emphasized, please.

Riess: I certainly understand.

Smith: When I was doing this, I also reviewed the political situation of the university.

Riess: You mean when you were preparing this?

Smith: Yes. I was thinking about the way in which the university had proceeded, say, from six campuses to eight when I left, nine now, and the presidents. It was really very interesting.

I also prepared a clear account of the history of procedures at the university, which I want to give to you. [deposited in University Archives, The Bancroft Library.]

7) Personal Background and Education

Riess: Despite your wish to omit the personal pronoun, "I," would you tell us where you were born, and educated?

Smith: I was born in Northampton, Massachusetts, of the famous Smiths. There, if you go to Northampton, every one out of four or five people is a Smith.

Riess: And were you really from a famous Smith?

Smith: Well, if you want to call Aunt Sophia famous, I suppose yes. We were the poor church mouse of the family. Aunt Sophia founded Smith College out of pique, because Andrew Vassar had established Vassar at Poughkeepsie. So she was very put out. She insisted that he was "nothing but a beer merchant." I always thought that that was simply scandal or spite at him. But it wasn't, he actually did manufacture beer in puritan New England, and that was the lowest thing you could do, so of course he was looked down on.

Aunt Sophia was a very vain old lady, deaf as a post. She couldn't hear what was said, she didn't read lips, and she wouldn't use her hearing aid, so she said the most malapropos things, thinking that she was right up to date. As a very small child I can still remember the members of the family making fun of all her malapropos remarks. If you want to know the date, it was December 18, 1886.

Riess: I'd say that was a very, very auspicious beginning.

Smith: I think if it weren't for the fact that I have to wear my glasses all the time, I'd still be skiing yet. I'm a ski maniac!

Riess: Did you go to private schools?

Smith: No, I went to public schools. They had a very fine high school in Springfield, Massachusetts. When I see some of the stuff that the kids have now in college, why, that's what I had in high school!

I went to Mount Holyoke College. My paternal grandfather's cousin was Sophia Smith. My maternal grandfather's second cousin was Mary Lyon, who founded Mount Holyoke. I went to Mount Holyoke for two reasons: my mother had gone there, and also it was very much cheaper. My father came to [financial] grief in my college career. I was having a wonderful time. I was raked out of college in the middle of my junior year. So I have no B.A. whatsoever.

Riess: Are you an oldest child?

Smith: Yes. I have two sisters. They were both born in Northampton.

Riess: When you were pulled out of college, you went to work?

Smith: No, I went to what is now a state university, and received a teacher's certificate, and squabbled with keeping ahead of the forty little devils out in front. I had a country school, which was very interesting. Then, when I was studying music, I substituted in Berkeley and in Oakland, but Berkeley mainly, and I filled out a term for quite a period for one of the toughest schools in Oakland. They had run a man out, so I came up against them the first day in there. But I pulled no punches, and I said [shouts], "Hey there, what do you mean by that?" That was the way to talk to them. I ended being very popular.

Riess: Why were you out here?

Smith: My father saw a business opportunity out here, some kind of commission, and came out here and it was very successful.

I think that everyone who comes direct from the East out here finds it oh, so crude, and they just hate it. I just detested the courses that I had in education.

I substituted, as I say, and I finished out nearly half a year in that tough school. That gave me something wherewith to eat. Then I did music for about, oh, maybe six or ten years, somewhere around there.

Riess: Where were you studying music?

Smith: With a symphony man over in San Francisco.

Riess: You were studying an instrument?

Smith: Yes, cello. It's the most beautiful instrument in the world.

Riess: Were you intending to be a concert cellist?

Smith: No, I did a great deal of orchestra work, and string quartets. I played wherever I could rake in any money.

Riess: Any of the others go on to greater glory?

Smith: Yes, I think the violinist pursued it, but I don't know what she did afterwards, when we broke up. The piano player was a mature person who had played with the San Jose Symphony. So she had already had her glory. Music became very dull at that time, and the only thing that I could get was a vaudeville engagement, and it didn't appeal to me very much.

I heard that there was a vacancy at the university here, in extension, so I applied. That position was filled, but the person in charge told me that the accounting department was looking for someone. I had taken a great deal of math in college to avoid physics and chemistry. (Only when I made my darkroom did I wish that I'd had physics and chemistry!) So I came up to the university, and I was going to stay six months, because I would not go home--my family lived in Chico--and you have to eat. I've discovered that seven glasses of water will keep you from being hungry a half an hour. [laughs] My complexion was never better! [laughs]

Riess: Where were you living?

Smith: On Bancroft Way, in one of the houses that has long since been torn down.

8) Thirty-six Years at the University

Riess: You got a job in accounting at the University.

Smith: Yes. I began thirty-six and a half years of service.

The university was at that time making claims, state claims for reimbursement. Then I got put in charge of the salary rolls, and the payroll, and the keeping of the budget for the different accounts for the different departments.

At that time there were only six stations. There was Berkeley--you see, Los Angeles wasn't--Davis, Riverside, those were the three big ones. Then there was La Jolla, which was set up by Ellen Scripps. La Jolla, Mount Hamilton, and one more.

Riess: Who were you working for when you were working in the accounting office?

Smith: The accountant at that time was Mr. Henry Harshaw Benedict. He had a mania, in which I was trained, and have since taken on, that everything you put out must be dated, and it must be signed, and it must have a clear title, three things that are absolutely vital to anything you do.

Riess: When you started out, were you just one of the girls, or did you occupy a position of some importance?

Smith: At that time it wasn't of particular importance, but I had quite an interview with the accountant. He thought with the amount of mathematics that I had had that he would best place me in the making of these state claims, submitting of these state claims. Then from that, it naturally led to the person who got up the salary roll, as we called it at that time. She got married, so I just naturally fell into that.

I came maybe ten days or two weeks after Mr. [Robert Gordon] Sproul was first appointed assistant comptroller. Then he was appointed comptroller, and I had a great deal to do with him. When he became president, he took two people: one was Miss [Agnes] Robb, and the other one was me, from the accounting department to the president's office, where I stayed for some thirty years.

After that time, the IBM was just beginning to take over accounting. I was beguiled by the promise of a card punch all my own, and a machine that runs it, a recording machine, all my own. So I got a staff of unexcelled people, and proceeded to do that. The biggest service I think that I rendered the university in all those years of service was the putting of the budget on the IBM after the IBM specialist said it couldn't be done. I knew it could be done. It took me about three months of overtime.

Smith: Before that, all the statistics on what we'd call the exchange universities, Harvard and Cornell and Michigan and Minnesota and Columbia and Chicago, statistics on salary, teaching load, we would grind it out on one of the Marchand calculators. I could see that if we put the budget on the IBM, it would be nothing but duck soup to just run the cards through.

The accountant [Olaf Lundberg] didn't include me in the interview with the IBM specialist. He was sure that he knew all the work, so it wasn't necessary at all. Well, the IBM people said there were just too many exceptions, it just couldn't be done, but I went to Lundberg and I said, "What about my doing it on my own, just to prove it?" He said, if I could, go ahead. So I took the cards and I marked them myself, and I devised a system for the exceptions, which you can always deal with, and there we are.

Riess: Was it unusual to have a woman in the position that you occupied?

Smith: Yes.

Riess: And you had to do an awful lot of asserting yourself over the years.

Smith: Quite a bit. And if you assert yourself too much, it's bad. If you don't assert yourself, you'll be nowhere, you'll be trampled on. So to steer a diplomatic career is quite something. Let me say that I think the very best way to turn a reasonable, ordinary person and to make them very tough is to be a woman in a man's job. You have to be twice as good; you work ten times as hard; you have to be terribly conscientious, and maybe you'll get half of what the men will get for a mediocre job.

Well, after I got budget off my neck, I overheard two people talking and I guess I had said that maybe they should use up their pencil ends, or something like that. But they were discussing me, and the fiat that I had set forth. One of them said, "Well, I'm not going in there to argue with that tough old bird." (But that's what you had to be.) I thought for quite a while; they weren't going away, so I might as well face it. I went out, and said, "Well, what have you got against a tough old bird?" I put it to them what they would have done under the circumstances, and we were the best of friends ever after.

You know, all things that you've done in the past build up to present crises that you may meet. Everything that I've done--like working in the printing shop gave me a knowledge of the process in printing the budget. Dealing with the professors, the chairmen of the departments and so on, gave me an insight about dealing with the administrators of our retirement fund.

9) Interests in Printing, Writing, and Skiing

Riess: At what time in your history were you working in the printing shop?

Smith: That was several years before I began either my writing career or my music career. I guess it was after I decided I wasn't cut out for a reporter.

Riess: Was that after you decided you weren't cut out to be a teacher?

Smith: Yes, I decided it was far too strenuous. I could make them learn, but it took too much out of me.

Riess: Then where were you a reporter?

Smith: On the Sacramento Bee. Then I went up to Seattle to work on the Seattle Post-Intelligencer. But I didn't like being a reporter for that. Then I came upon this beautiful printing shop that printed scientific treatises. Oh, it was the most interesting thing, I hated to give it up, but I wanted to see some of the rest of my life.

Riess: You mean, the work is so close?

Smith: No, it was the glare on the proof paper. Proof paper is a cheap grade of paper that is highly glazed to take the ink, very easy to print on. It was the glare of the light on that that did not agree with me.

Riess: You made a lot of big changes in your life. May I ask if there were any men in your life at that point?

Smith: Oh, no. I was just writing.

Riess: You just didn't have time for them?

Smith: Well, I nearly got married to go to Alaska with a ranger. But I decided no, I don't want that.

Riess: When did you say you started skiing?

Smith: When I began skiing? Well, I'm crazy about mountains, and that kind of life.

When I lived in the Cascades, when I was depending on the magazines for my sustenance, it was necessary to go down to the mine and get provisions, and it was seven or nine miles down, and eleven to fifteen back, depending. So we went down on skis. My father had

Smith: given me his big Colt .44--Smith and Wesson, it was. I wore it under my coat. If one of the mine men started to get fresh, all I did was just put my hand in my pocket, and that brought out the butt of the big .44. Nobody ever tackled me after that. [laughter]

Where I was first skiing was with a bunch of friends in Yosemite, either over Christmas or New Year's, and one of the fellows borrowed the ranger's skis. They, of course, had bindings. We went up to skate, not to ski, but he got these, and I discovered that you could steer them!

Later I ran into Joel Hildebrand, being in the Sierra Club, and I have been a lost soul ever since. I've skied for thirty-five years, and I've had five accidents, every one of them my own fault. One time, my last one, I was showing off. There were a bunch of fellows down there, and of course I was showing what a big skier I was. I hit soft snow, and not having glasses on--if I'd had glasses on, I would have known what to do--but not having glasses on, if you don't prepare for it, it's fatal. That was my last broken leg. I've had three broken legs. And I'd rather have any number of broken legs or broken arms or anything, rather than anything happen to your ribs. Your ribs are awful. I've had accidents to my ribs, on dry land, terra firma, not on skiing, and you can't take a deep breath, you mustn't cough, and you certainly cannot sneeze without the most extreme agony.

Riess: Were you doing your skiing with a Sierra Club group?

Smith: No, although I'm a life member. But all my friends are Sierra Club, and I want to absolutely get away from people; and the mountains are the best place to do it. So I've gone on twenty pack trips. I can handle three mules all by myself, and rope them and pack them.

Riess: You mean you packed into high country?

Smith: Yes, I like the very high country, the Whitney country. We went in a great many times from Mineral King. And as fond as I am of skiing, I did everything I could to help it not be made one of Walt Disney's ski things.

Riess: Well, that introduces you beautifully, a brief but sensational account! [Miss Smith, editing the manuscript, called this section "unwontedly garrulous," but despite her objections, it is included. SBR]

Smith: Yes, I think quite thoroughly. I have an awful temper, which I have at last learned to control. And I like to live in peace and harmony.

1) The Beginnings

Riess: When did you become a member of the Women's Faculty Club, and what was your position on campus?

Murdock: I worked in the office of the dean of women, who was Lucy Ward Stebbins, and I was aware of the club even before I became a member. The first members were all academic faculty people, including Miss Stebbins and Dr. Jessica Peixotto and Agnes Fay Morgan, and Barbara Armstrong of law, and Miss Coulter of the library. It was a whole group of people with academic status. It was not until after the club was incorporated by those people that they invited some of the administrative people to become members. I was in that group of staff people who were next to the founders in status of membership.

Riess: Some administrative people were invited, but others weren't?

Murdock: They did take the upper levels, what would be the administrative assistants rather than the clerks and typists. And of course, at that time, it was for women. Now the members include quite a few men, just as the men's club has women members, which would have been quite impossible at that time. In fact, there wouldn't have been a Women's Faculty Club if the men had been a little more cordial to even opening the hospitality of their clubhouse to women.

Riess: Josephine Miles said that that group of women were the bluestockings. What was your sense of those early faculty women?

Murdock: Dr. Peixotto was one of the early Ph.D.'s from this campus, a very brilliant economist. In those days there wasn't a Department of Social Welfare, and sociology as such was included in economics, because economics is the foundation for sociology in a sense. Dr. Peixotto and Lucy Stebbins, who graduated from Radcliffe and was a social worker in New England before she was invited to come to be assistant to the dean of women and shortly after that the dean, were typical of that scholarly group of early professors on the campus.

Murdock: Dr. Agnes Fay Morgan was probably the most distinguished academically, because while she was attached to what was called home economics at that time, she was a chemist and a nutritionist of distinction. Some of the other members, as Josephine told you, seemed to be of the bluestocking class.

Perhaps World War I had something to do with the fact that women had status--not in all departments: history and English, both with the British tradition, were willing to give them graduate work and let them get their doctor's degrees, but not give them campus positions. But economics had several, and of course the language departments had some. Mathematics had some excellent women scholars, including Sophie Levy and Miss Pauline Sperry. Miss Tabor was in German. The Women's Faculty Club profited by the fact that the Sperry-Tabor pair were economists of sorts, too; they handled the finances that were done most successfully, and were responsible for the short time before our club was all ours and the mortgage cleared. So we were fortunate to have that group of scholars. The Library School and the University Library provided the club with several others: Miss Coulter and her sister and Miss Nella Martin and several others were original members.

Riess: What does that expression, bluestocking, mean?

Murdock: That's a British term for a woman who was scholarly. I don't know why the stockings were blue, but it's an expression for people that were academically renowned, but not necessarily socially acceptable because of it. At any rate, it's a good term for a general description of the founders.

Riess: Why did they need to band together?

Murdock: I think they were friendly because of their scholarly interests. I think in a sense, the building of the clubhouse was a factor due to their campus position of second-class citizens, as it were. The Faculty Club was definitely for men; the women were allowed to use one of the corner dinner rooms, the little north dining room, and the so-called powder room, where the student waitresses left all their books and paraphernalia. It was not a gracious place to entertain visiting faculty women. I think that they felt that they wanted their own dignity and their own campus status, and a clubhouse of their own would accomplish that.

Riess: And a club, per se, was a more important thing then, I gather.

Murdock: I think probably so. About the same time, the College Women's Club and the Women's City Club in Berkeley all were founded. Several of the clubs changed and have become co-educational. Even the Women's Faculty Club is somewhat so. But at least it hasn't ever folded up, and has represented the fact that women can be good business managers and maintain something of that sort.

Riess: What I have gathered is that the first thing they [founders] did was create The Building Committee, and I'm wondering what that committee's relationship was to the club as it developed simultaneously. Was the committee always the seat of power? Or did it answer to the board?

Murdock: There was a board of directors, and the Building Committee was part of it. For instance, when Miss [Hope] Gladding was doing the furnishing, she'd go to the Building Committee for funds for purchasing. But the whole board got practically the same people to handle a mixture of things. I'd say that of course, as anybody would agree, Lucy Stebbins was the founder of the founders, and would come through anonymously with financial support when needed.

Riess: From her own resources?

Murdock: Yes.

2) The Building

Riess: Do you remember anything of building the club, and of John Galen Howard?

Murdock: Yes, I do, because my first job on the campus, as I said, was in the dean of women's office, so I was in on the early days of the planning and the selecting of the architect, and the ideas of grandeur that they had, which would have included a fireplace in every room, with a very fancy concrete structure. I was in Miss Stebbins' office when the Building Committee members, Dr. Morgan and Miss Coulter among others, came back from the city. The lowest bid had been three times as much as they expected to have to pay for the building. [brief tape interruption]

Riess: You said that the lowest bid came in three times what they expected to pay. Were there other architects consulted?

Murdock: I don't know who the other competitors were, but they wanted to have Mr. Howard do it. Actually, I'm wrong, it wasn't a competition. It was the bids for the cost of building the club. But we had delusions of grandeur, the club did, and had to change a little bit-- pull in our horns!

Riess: The original drawings appeared to be of a stucco-clad building.

Murdock: I have no regrets; I think the shingles are attractive. And I think Howard needs to be appreciated on the range of things that he could adapt to. It was nice to know that while buildings like the more classical ones on the campus represented his Beaux Arts scholarship, that he could make a lovely shingled building that's worn so well and has been so efficient and functional.

Riess: Yes, that's a good point. So then finally--

Murdock: Finally they had to give up the tiled roof and stucco and have the shingled building, which is much more characteristic of a California structure.

Riess: I wonder if Julia Morgan was in the running for architect.

Murdock: I don't think so. I'm surprised she wasn't, because, of course, she did beautiful buildings, and was a woman, and it would have seemed more logical to have had her. In fact, some people thought that she did do the building.* Howard was the university architect, and it was probably the proper thing to--maybe it was required, I'm not sure about that. But at any rate, it didn't occur to me that that was a choice. It could have been, I suppose.

3) Club Activities, Early

Riess: What were those early days of the club like? What did you do as a club?

Murdock: If you have access to the archives, if they haven't disappeared, you ought to find little notices which probably Josephine Smith printed, of a good many of the little social parties. Not only Christmas parties, but ones during the year in which we would have a costume party, or a meeting for new members, or our annual meeting. They never were social to the extent that other women's clubs were because they were all busy, professional people, and they didn't join it just to play bridge and talk about children and houses.

Riess: Were there speakers that would come to the meetings?

*There is correspondence in the WFC files with Julia Morgan, who consulted with the club on the advisability of earthquake insurance in 1927. [SBR]

Murdock: We'd have speakers at meetings. We didn't have them as they now have occasionally "Lunch and Learns," but we did have occasional speakers. There was a smaller group of what you might say the bluestockings that had their more scholarly gatherings. We called them the "Learned Ladies."

But the club was not entirely social, as many clubs are. It didn't keep going because people did play bridge; it kept going because it housed visitors. It did give--and always has given--good food, well served, which appealed to the membership. And a good many faculty people, of course, even with their own homes, liked to have dinner out. And the lunch was always popular.

Actually, the club membership as a whole partially supported the residents because they lived there quite frugally. I don't think what they paid in rent and paid for their meals really covered their total expenses adequately, so some of the people who didn't use the club regularly helped contribute through their memberships.

Riess: Off and on in those early years, were there attempts made to do more reading of scholarly papers among the women, and considering of the role of women?

Murdock: The "Learned Ladies" read papers. But they were not belligerently feminist in that sense. The academic ones were pretty well established and not feeling put out by lack of recognition. And the administrators at that time--actually there was a group of them that behind the scenes were the stable staff of the faculty. Each division, like the graduate division or the extension, the different departments, had some woman who really, behind the scenes, managed things. I guess probably it's still true in a good many departments. I don't think that any of them felt put upon or abused. They had their status; the deans could come and go, but the administrative assistants, or secretaries as they were called then, kept a certain amount of stability with the structure of the administration.

Riess: That's right. Often they have a lot of power.

Murdock: Yes, it was behind-the-scenes power that they had. I guess they were aware of it and felt the responsibility of their positions.

Riess: Then, for those people, was it a place where they could come together to talk about the business of their on-campus jobs, for instance?

Murdock: It could be. I don't know that they did particularly. Some, like Josephine Smith, liked to come and would hide herself behind a magazine because it was a place for peace and quiet where she wouldn't be disturbed by talking shop. So it was understood that if you wanted to get away from shop at noontime, that was your privilege.

Riess: Did the academics automatically join?

Murdock: No, there are always some women on the campus who saw no need for the club and didn't join. It wasn't held against them. You joined if you wanted to. And if you were invited and didn't join, that was your privilege.

Riess: I wonder if that represents a point of view of seeing no real need for the club.

Murdock: I think probably so. There might have been some that would have joined if it were men and women, but saw no particular need for a separate women's club. I think, as a whole, the academic women on the campus supported the club, but there were always some that didn't choose to and that was their prerogative.

4) Furnishings

Riess: I got us off the subject, and I think it would be a great mistake if you didn't say something for the record about the furnishing of the club and Hope Gladding's role. So let's get back to the point where we have a clubhouse built.

Murdock: The clubhouse was finished just about the right time to take the refugees from the Berkeley fire. It was in '23 that the club opened, in September, so it needed to be furnished pretty much in a hurry. Hope Gladding, as a member of the home economics department, as it was then called, was asked to select furnishings, but without very adequate funds for it. So she had to ask the board for money for bureaus for the bedrooms. She designed the tables and chairs for the dining room and selected the living room furniture, which now includes pieces that were gifts. [The oak dining room tables, with pedestal bases, were still there in 1982, although refinished to a lighter color. SBR]

Many of the real treasures of the early days were the ones that she bought from shops that had oriental material that was available, and wouldn't be available now--they really brought in treasures from the Orient. The club profited by the fact that at that time things like the collapsible desk in the library and one of the chests in the living room were just available in antique shops, and she picked them.

Riess: In Chinatown?

Murdock: No, most of the things that she bought were from Mrs. Churchill and Mrs. Sanderson, who had shops in Berkeley, who imported oriental things.

Riess: I've heard the name Imogen Sanderson.

Murdock: Yes, right.

Riess: And Churchill?

Murdock: Also was somebody that had oriental things.

But many of the things she designed or had made. The little bureaus that we had came from Gorman's [Berkeley unfinished furniture store], and just were painted bright colors to look cheerful and embellish the bedrooms.

Riess: Gorman's is an institution!

Murdock: Gorman's is an institution that for a long time has contributed its share of equipment.

Riess: I haven't seen the sleigh-beds.

Murdock: They were very pretty. Sleigh-beds have curved ends and are graceful, and they were very comfortable. But the very fact that they had these curved ends made them not as sturdy as standard beds. And they were outsized [undersized] so that you couldn't get new mattresses for them. So little by little they got replaced. But I'm sure some of them are floating around, because some of the people that loved them bought them when the club was disposing of them. I think there may be a couple of them still around. I rather think the last time I looked in the upstairs lounge there was a sleigh-bed there.

Riess: After John Galen Howard designed the building, did he come back and spend time?

Murdock: Not particularly. I mean, I think he was pleased with the club. I suppose he was disappointed that the original plans couldn't be carried out, but after all, while his reputation was for more solid marble and granite, and later concrete, I think that he did very well with what he had to.

Riess: There was a comment that the Spanish-style interior, white walls, dark trim, and wrought iron, was "as if they had been recommended by some banker as a condition for a collateral loan."

Murdock: I can't answer that, what banker could have been involved in that.

Riess: Or whether that was literally true.

Murdock: I think that may be a little imaginative. I could ask Hope, but I don't think she'd be quite sure about that. She wasn't in on the original financing of the club, but was there in time enough to do a good deal of the furnishing. It was the style at that time, and you didn't have to match your outside and your inside entirely.

Riess: Speaking of the style inside, I wanted to find out from you about the room people were taken to see because it had [laughing] the red bed?

Murdock: The early furniture was just the unpainted variety, and I think it was Hope Gladding who had an eye for color and thought it would be nice to have rooms with different atmospheres. I had a green room, but there were pale blue ones, and of course there was a red one. Sometimes it went with whatever rug happened to be there, but it was never a dull similarity of sort of boarding house style. They all had a little spirit to them.

5) Residents and the Dining Service

Murdock: The club over its years--of course, one of its excellent functions was housing and caring for visiting scholars. We had wonderful people living in the club in my days of residence who were on the faculty of Vassar, of Wellesley, or other colleges, who had sabbaticals and came out and appreciated the club, as well as Berkeley, and gave it, you might say, a somewhat international reputation.

The early days had quite a few campus people that were more or less permanent residents. Then they made a regulation that people who retired--say at the age of sixty-five--couldn't remain at the club: they didn't want it to become an old ladies home. There was a chance that people who retired would want to stay in the clubs indefinitely. There were a couple of old boys that did at The Faculty Club.

It wasn't retroactive, so we did have two or three people who continued on at the club after their retirement. But it was supposed to be as a residence for people actively connected with the university or visiting the university. The regulation was that after people reached sixty-five or so, they could remain there only for a couple of years; they didn't want to have them on into their seventies, and at that time, I think Miss [May] Dornin and Lucille Czarnowski were about the only residents that would fit into the pattern of perpetuity. It was all right in that case because they had been there before the rule was made, but May didn't really want to, and is very comfortably off over at the Sequoias [retirement apartments in San Francisco], but the idea was that she didn't have to go. She could have stayed on indefinitely.

- Murdock: Now, it's even more a transient entity, because it can fill up pretty well with visiting people, and not too many Berkeley people want to live in a residence place of that sort. The people that come--quite a few faculty stayed there while they were looking for homes and getting established, and then moved to their own domiciles and continued their active interest in the club, but as, you might say, non-resident members.
- Riess: Was that stimulating, to have the transients?
- Murdock: Oh, very definitely so!
- Riess: They really interacted?
- Murdock: They interacted, and I think the club breakfast table, which had about twenty people, was always a discussion group. That included, of course, visitors and residents, and the local people, and people with a great many different points of view: scholars in the science field, and librarians, and people in the arts. So it was always a nice melting pot.
- Riess: In all those years between 1923, let's say, and 1967, was the club conflict-free?
- Murdock: I would say so, yes. I feel like a thirty-third degree Mason because, having been in Miss Stebbins's office before the club started, and having been a resident, and having been an officer one time and another on boards and committees, and then having worked in the club office for quite a period after I retired from my campus job, I sort of feel as though I've watched the club over a fairly long period. Though I would say that my active participation perhaps didn't include being in the heart of the merger concern.
- Riess: During what period were you a resident?
- Murdock: From '23 until '40. I lived in the clubhouse from almost its start until I came to share Miss Gladding's house. So I did watch it from the inside.
- Riess: That is interesting. The club breakfast table was one large groaning board?
- Murdock: I think it sometimes groaned if they got into too heavy arguments. People could make breakfast upstairs. Each floor had a little gas stove and the equipment with which people could have a cup of coffee and a piece of toast. But most of the residents had their breakfasts downstairs. Now, breakfast is included in being there, which is to discourage them using upstairs, I guess.

Riess: When you said that the residents were somewhat supported by the club, I didn't realize you were speaking from a resident's point of view.

Murdock: I felt that they did more for us than we did for them.

The residents didn't always dine at the club. One of the reasons that finally the three meals deal was abandoned was that--in my days in the office, we had the dinners going, but you didn't know whether you were going to have five or fifty in the dining room. And union help is costly. By the time you have your cook and your salad girl and your second cook and a eight-hour shift so that they wouldn't be there for breakfast through dinner, the expense of a meal was just unreasonable. You couldn't charge people enough to pay for that amount of help without any assurance that you were going to have a given number of people eating there. Since the house never had more than two dozen residents--I mean, there were less than twenty-four rooms--even if everybody there ate dinner, you still have to count on the town's members to support the dining room. And it never really worked to that extent.

Riess: So the dinner-dining service then--

Murdock: --had to fold up.*

6) The Issue of Merger

Riess: When were you in the office? I don't think I have those dates down.

Murdock: I don't know. In the fifties and early sixties, because it was after I had retired and before the last chapters of the merger. I was still there when they were working on that, and the book of pictures was being provided. But my closer association with the office was probably in the forties and fifties, after I'd moved up here with Hope, and wasn't living at the club, but was still working in the office and keeping in touch with things that way.

Riess: That was not a volunteer position?

Murdock: No. All the earlier--being on the board--were volunteer, but when I was in the office, it was as office manager, and not a large salary, but at least sometimes half-time pay for full-time work.

*[The WFC stopped serving dinners Nov. 1, 1971, and stopped serving lunches Jan. 3, 1972. SBR]

Riess: In your long association with the club, before 1967, was a cooperative arrangement with The Faculty Club ever a point of discussion in those years?

Murdock: Over the years, I think it wasn't. I think that they worked mutually in a friendly manner, but there wasn't any thought of swallowing the women's club and turning the space into a parking lot. It was just two clubs, and they each had their function, and people could interchange meals, so that the faculty wives, the ladies, could always use the club, sign chits by way of the men's club. Just as the women used the men's club for dinner and for parties and things. The exchange of club chits was on a fairly even basis in the days when I was in the office. We paid them as much as they paid us back and forth on the billings.

Riess: But their food reputation was poor compared to yours, wasn't it?

Murdock: Yes. But it still was a popular place to take your friends and to have access to.

Riess: The Haas family gift was to be contingent on agreeing to consolidate management operations. Now, what is that referring to?

Murdock: I'm sure that was one of the items of the proposed merger, I think, of having the dining rooms combined, which didn't really work. It was just about the time that I was leaving the office that they were really about to take over, so I got out just in time, I think, not to be--

Riess: Crushed.

Murdock: Yes, crushed in that particular machine.

I think that we have profited in our recent regeneration from some of those campus funds. But again, I'm not up on the financial benefit that might have come from campus regulations on bringing things up to date for handicapped people and such, and for the funds provided for that, which I think is the case, that the elevator, the ramp, were ones that were necessitated in a public building, but didn't fall financially on the club members.

Riess: That's an interesting point, a good incentive, certainly, How about the Mel gift? I'm interested that Mel is Florence Nachtrieb Mel.

Murdock: Yes, she was Barbara's sister, and she was very generous in her will to the club. She was one of the associate members because of her various activities. So she wasn't just the sister of a member, but an active supporter of the club, and very generous in her will in contributing to the club.

Riess: Josephine Smith certainly was an articulate member.

Murdock: I have great admiration for Josephine Smith. I think she's a smart cookie, and she does have a driving spirit. She's been most loyal and interested in the club, and sensitive to its needs and development. I think we've been very fortunate to have somebody like Josephine.

Riess: Without Josephine Smith, do you think the merger would have gone through?

Murdock: Possibly. I think that we owe her a great deal of appreciation for all of her understanding of what a tragedy it would be, although I guess I had an optimistic feeling that the club was going to survive, and was a little perplexed by some of the people of the club that seemed to be in favor of the merger. I'm sure they meant well, and they felt that there should be just one campus club, which has its point. But I'm so glad that we still have our separate entity, and that we've survived that period of stress.

7) Personal History

[Interview 2: December 1, 1981. Interview held at Riess home]

Riess: Miss Murdock, because we had too little time when we first interviewed, I want to go back now and get more of your history, and elaborate on a few questions about the club. Where were you born, and when?*

Murdock: I was born in San Francisco in 1894. We lived in a house built by the architect Ernest Coxhead, out on Scott Street near the Presidio. I remember watching the soldiers going off to the Philippines, marching along Lombard Street just below us. We went often to the Presidio to watch ceremonies. It was a very pleasant neighborhood. Of course later, it was on the outskirts of the Exposition in 1915, which in my day was just a kind of pond and open space.

Riess: Were you the first owners of that Coxhead house?

Murdock: Yes, Father had it built. Coxhead was a friend and neighbor. His own house was right around the corner on Green Street. I remember going down to see the little Coxhead children.

*For a more comprehensive history, see Belle of the Sather Tower Bells, 1980, 52 p., an interview with Margaret Murdock conducted by Paul Machlis in 1976. In The Bancroft Library, University of California, Berkeley.

Riess: Your father was a printer?

Murdock: Father was a printer, and married rather late in life. He was in his fifties when I was born. His wife died in 1903, leaving Father with three children under ten, and he well over sixty. So it was kind of a generation gap that made me feel that I knew a lot about early San Francisco, because he had been quite active, not only as a printer, but in church work, and to a certain extent in politics.

Riess: After your mother's death he carried on the household?

Murdock: Yes, we were all at home. I had a younger sister that I kept an eye on. I had an older brother. I think we all developed a good deal of independence, as you do when you have an older father who is a darling but not too domestically inclined.

Riess: Did he bring his friends around?

Murdock: Yes, and one of his closest friends was Dr. Horatio Stebbins, for whom he served as Sunday school superintendent under the ministry of his Unitarian pastor. He knew Lucy Stebbins as a little girl when he was a widower before he married my mother. He used to go to have lunch with the Stebbins family with St. Nicholas in one pocket and candy in the other. The children thought he was a very welcome visitor to the home. That really is responsible for my coming to the campus to work for Miss Stebbins; it was kind of all in the family.

Riess: Did your father fill you early with ambitions?

Murdock: Not particularly. I think that he thought college was for boys. So, my brother went right from Lowell High School to college. I went to the San Francisco Normal School to become a teacher, and did teach to earn my expenses to come to college. That was probably my own desire rather than family pressure.

Riess: Where did your brother go to college?

Murdock: He came to the university.

Riess: Do you remember making that decision to go to the university or to normal school?

Murdock: I do not think there was any question of my going to the university when I was out of high school. I just went immediately to the normal school and taught in San Francisco, which I enjoyed. But I liked the university life. When Miss Stebbins invited me to be the office assistant, I was glad to accept. I have never been sorry that I had all of these years on the campus.

- Murdock: Actually, I did not enter the university until 1916. I was a freshman the first year, and a senior the next one. I graduated in 1918 because I had accumulated some miscellaneous credits from the normal school and from some summer session studies over here. By majoring in economics I could kind of double up on courses. So I really only had two undergraduate regular years here.
- Riess: Was Miss Peixotto an inspiring teacher?
- Murdock: She was a very inspiring teacher in economics, and Miss Stebbins also taught courses. There was not any social welfare college at that time. Social economics was part of the Economics Department; the courses on poverty, and care and dependents and so forth, that would normally be in sociology or in social welfare, were all given under the aegis of economics.
- Riess: It sounds like it was a strong department.
- Murdock: It was a very strong department. Actually, I think I would have majored in English or history, but I didn't know much about economics and I liked English and history, so I thought I might as well learn something different and widen my horizons a little by something that just didn't come as easily as English and history did.
- Riess: Well, you certainly had a well established Puritan ethic there, I must say.
- Murdock: I expect so! [laughter]
- Riess: Did you envision yourself doing something that was more related to economics?
- Murdock: I don't think so. I don't think I was a career aspirant particularly. I probably thought I would go back to teaching. I did teach a little while after I graduated, but was glad to return to the campus. I think that I felt that the responsibility of educating the very young was a pretty heavy responsibility.
- Riess: Where did you live when you were a student?
- Murdock: I lived in a boarding house and in a sorority. Then, briefly, my sister, who was younger than I, kept house. So I had a variety of campus experiences in different types of housing.

8) Dean Stebbins; The Mothers and Daughters

Riess: Then you were asked by Dean Stebbins to take the job.

Murdock: Yes, and in those days there was a dean and an assistant dean, Mrs. Davidson, and one and later two office assistants that did a little of everything because in those days the Dean of Women's Office had housing, student employment, scholarships and loans and a great many activities that are now scattered through different offices all over the campus.

Riess: Is it entirely predictable, as you look back over the picture, that it would be Dean Stebbins who would start the Women's Faculty Club?

Murdock: I think she and Dr. Peixotto and Dr. Morgan and the others were all close friends. I think that they felt that it would be much more dignified to have their own club. They were not militant people, but they had their standards of quality. I think the position of dean of women made her feel that the cause of women in general, faculty as well as students, it was something that was part of the picture.

Riess: Part of her job almost.

Murdock: I would say so, yes.

Riess: In one of the scrapbooks that I found in the vault, it mentions a woman, Caroline Bates Singleton of the French Department, who apparently wrote a letter that got Dean Stebbins thinking about it. I wondered whether Caroline Singleton was somebody that we should get down on the record.

Murdock: Yes, she should be. When I think of the women, I think of Miss Coulter and Miss Peixotto and Dr. Morgan, but I do remember that Miss Singleton was a leading spirit that way. She did not stay in the campus too long.

I'm glad you had some of those archives, because Miss Davis kept really careful records of everything. A lot of the material of the early days, the records of meetings and so forth, tell quite a part of the picture.

Riess: Oh, they are very beautifully kept records. As a matter of fact, I wanted to know a little bit more about Miss Davis.

Murdock: Oh, Miss Davis was a delightful New Englander of scholarly interests.

You asked me about the faculty women, and Sarah Davis, like Miss Peixotto and Miss Stebbins and several of the others, were what you would call devoted daughters with a capital "D." They had really quite wonderful mothers. I don't know who looked after which, whether the daughter took care of the mother or--in some cases I think the mothers made life easier, at least in their earlier days, for their daughters, which would be the natural situation.

Miss Davis and her mother both lived at the club. I remember her mother very well, but Miss Davis--I guess she was from Wellesley; several of the physical education people came from Wellesley in those days. She was just a naturally efficient secretary to keep records of the club, and I'm sure of the department in a similarly meticulous way.

Riess: Where did Dean Stebbins live?

Murdock: Miss Stebbins and her mother had a delightful house on Durant, between College and Piedmont, belonging to the university, and backing up to the Hilgard house on Bancroft. It was a center for entertainment.

Miss Peixotto and her mother lived at Cloyne Court, which was a faculty center of sorts too, in those days. Miss Davis and her mother were burned out and moved into the club as part of the early first residents. Miss Coulter and her mother and sister had an apartment on Euclid and Hearst and then later built a house up on Hawthorne Terrace.

So they [founders] were not, except for the Davises, residents of the club, but lived near the club usually in something that was a proper place for a mother and daughter.

Riess: That is fascinating. Let me continue down the list and then ask a few more questions about that. How about Miss Helen Fancher?

Murdock: Miss Fancher lived on Durant. Miss May Lent, who was also in the Household Arts Department, lived at the club. Miss Fancher had a mother also in those days. So, I would say that the pattern of quite a few of those was a scholarly daughter and an admiring mother who was pleased that the daughter had recognition on the campus.

Riess: Where were the fathers? These were all widows?

Murdock: Yes, all the mothers were widows.

- Riess: Isn't that fascinating? Of course, Agnes Fay Morgan was Mrs. Morgan.
- Murdock: Yes, she was, as I can recall, about the only one who had a husband. It was quite amusing: she was a chemist, rather a nutritionist, but her research was in chemistry, and so she usually wore a long smock, and when her son arrived on the scene, everybody was startled because nobody knew that he was on his way.
- Riess: Do you remember the sense of startled shock?
- Murdock: Yes, I do, very decidedly. That kind of amusement that she could hide it so successfully all during her pregnancy. She was just Dr. Morgan doing her research. The long white apron, as it were, kept that a deep secret.
- Riess: Was she a spokesman, for dual career marriages, or anything like that?
- Murdock: I do not think so. They all spoke easily, but I think the person that everybody preferred as a club speaker was Edith Coulter. She had wit and wisdom and flair for that type of thing. Miss Stebbins spoke well, but I think it was a little more of an effort for her. I think she was naturally shy.
- Riess: Well, in terms of the dual career thing, which is certainly an issue these days, I wondered if you ever heard Mrs. Morgan on the subject of how she balanced home and family?
- Murdock: No, I do not think I ever did. I saw her at the club and admired her, but I was not in on any discussions of double careers.
- Riess: Do you think she was a role model for students?
- Murdock: Possibly so. She had a very nice little son. Mrs. Davidson also had a very charming son who became a doctor, but I think her husband died even before Charles was born. So she was one of the widows that made her career on the campus. But in the other cases, it was the mothers that were widows.
- Riess: Miss Patterson, where did she live?
- Murdock: Miss Patterson had a very attractive home, on Cedar just below Euclid.
- Riess: Did she live alone?
- Murdock: Yes. Oh, wait a minute. Yes, I think she did. She had a sister, but I am pretty sure that she was alone.

Riess: Dean Stebbins's presidency of the club for all of those years, non-stop, was there ever any question about that? Did anyone ever run against her?

Murdock: I think everybody thought she was a wonderful president. I think she would have been glad to have somebody else take it on. It just seemed to be her responsibility.

9) Credentials Counsellor

Riess: You had your job as the assistant in her office, and then got into a different position. How did that happen, and when?

Murdock: I don't just remember just why it happened, but I was asked to be the secretary to Professor Leonard in the late twenties when he was in the President's Office as a coordinator of junior college relationships for the university, to see that the university and junior colleges worked together for the best interest of students, and that the university, among other things, in connection with staffing junior colleges, hunted up the best people they could find, whether or not they were University of California graduates.

There was a little feeling that the placement office had the responsibility of placing University of California graduates only, that while we would be glad to staff the junior colleges with our own graduates, that it was our responsibility to help them search for the best qualified college people they could get. It was an office that was at first a little separate from Mrs. Cheney's placement office with the thought of cooperating with junior college recruitment.

Then it gradually merged. He went back to Columbia. He was in the Education Department in the field of higher education. He had this joint position as "university representative in education relations." After he left for Columbia, his assistant got moved over to handle, more or less, the college placement aspects of the placement office. Then that got over into advising credentialling. It involved the credentialling of the junior college people to begin with. It ended by going into all the students, sort of the technicalities of certification.

I did this for so many years under the title of credentials counselor, but attached to the placement office. Rather loosely, though, because it was sort of a separate function. They had the products when the students got through, but I had the advising on the way to the certification.

Riess: So you really did work closely with students. About how many students would you be dealing with?

Murdock: A lot, because you had your current crop that were finishing up, which might be two or three hundred. But, you had your undergraduate student from their freshman year on who might say, "I want to go into teaching." And the faculty advisor would say, "Go see Miss Murdock," on combination of minors that would work with majors, or the sequence of prerequisites, by which they could most easily get through.

It was better to start in education courses as an elective in the junior and the senior year, but we didn't accept education majors. You always had your field. The idea was to see that you had your best campus equipment and materials to teach. If you left it all to the graduate years it was kind of doubling up a little bit too much on the prerequisites and the practice teaching itself.

So you had your responsibility to see that they could edge in a course or so per semester around their academic requirements to facilitate finishing up easily in the fifth year.

Riess: Did you have a very wide network, then, of people that you knew in the state? [telephone interruption] What kind of awareness did you have of all of the high schools and positions that your students might be guided into. How did you keep in touch?

Murdock: I suppose if you are in that sort of job in Mrs. Cheney's office, you get to know the schools pretty well. I don't know how it happened, but I was also responsible for the schedules pretty much of the university faculty people that went to visit schools, so you knew who liked to go see the little schools because he could go fishing on an odd day if he was up in the mountains [laughing], or who preferred the Catholic private schools because they fed them so well, and who liked visiting in the big schools in the cities.

That type of contact that the faculty people had with the schools gave me insight into some of the little schools, of what they needed. Of course, any native Californian who has travelled about a bit has a somewhat vivid picture of the types of schools and the adjustments that some city-born young people will have to [make] being up at Fort Bragg or Fort Jones or some of the very small areas.

That was part of the pleasure of being in touch, and part of the pleasure since has been the fact that you have been acquainted with teachers from all over, and perhaps, at least they say, you did something to make it easier for them to get started.

Riess: Oh, I should think it would be very effective, all the way around. Did you find yourself placing many young men as teachers?

Murdock: Oh, yes, and quite a few that came back to the campus remembered me as having helped them get their first jobs, like Garff Wilson, who went up to Arcata and the college there, and some of the others that were physical education, athletes, but got into administration as so many of them do in time. These were ones that remembered me from their undergraduate days.

10) Comments on Club Membership

Riess: You knew so many people, from your job, and then you were active in the club. How active in the club were Agnes Fay Morgan, or Mary Patterson--both from home economics?

Murdock: I don't think either of them became very active as administration members of the club, as far as that is concerned. They were busy with their own departments, I think. Miss Patterson did a lot, when we had parties, in arranging costumes, if we had a costume party or something of that sort. She contributed from her field of interest rather than the general administrative side of the club.

Riess: Talking about arranging, I wanted to ask you about Lucille Czarnovski.

Murdock: She did beautiful flower arrangements. She loved it and she did a wonderful job. I think that was much appreciated as a form of expression. Again, she was in the field of physical education, but her main interest was the dance. I think she was an artist by temperament, and flower arrangement went in with that side of her interest rather than the gymnastic side of the Physical Education Department.

Riess: Was she Russian?

Murdock: No, it's a Russian name, but she grew up in southern California, second or third generation. So the name maybe sounds more like a Pavlova dancer than it should. [laughter]

One of the characters at the club in the early days was Sara Huntsman Sturgess, a very able person, but had her own temperament. I think she believed in a bit of sarcasm and fight, seeing that students developed strength to withstand criticism and such. Some students adored her and some were so afraid of her that they just crawled under the table. In her own philosophy she thought that was the way to develop their independence. Some people could take it and some couldn't.

Riess: I was struck by the number of physical education teachers and administrators there seem to be on the roster of early Women's Faculty Club members.

Murdock: Well, physical education was a required subject, so they had to have enough staff people to take care of all of the freshmen and sophomores that had to take something. The staff on the campus didn't get tenure; they didn't, most of them, have the academic degrees to start up the ladder toward full professorship, so that there were a good many young people coming and going that taught in the department and then went elsewhere.

Riess: Has there been any racial or religious prejudice in the club over the years?

Murdock: I would say none. I don't think that was because the president was a Unitarian and naturally broadminded in such things; it just happened. There weren't too many minority people that were qualified to be professors or even secretaries in the early days.

We always had Chinese. We always had, if it is a question of denomination, a good many Jewish--I mean, it wasn't all New England Presbyterians, as it were. It was a pretty broad religious scope. I don't think anybody would have been refused membership for any of the racial or other qualifications.

Riess: Really, these days, everything is an issue. I wondered if there were such issues then. For instance, when Christmas parties came along, did people speak up and say, "Well, what about a Hanukkah party?"

Murdock: I don't think there ever was, because Miss Peixotto was Jewish, but I don't think that she ever felt that we should have Hanukkah instead of Christmas. [laughing] I think in those early days a great many of the university staff--Dean [Charles] Lipman, Dean [Monroe] Deutsch were both Jewish. I think the whole feeling is that they were some of the best administrators we ever had, and nobody cared whether they went to a church or a synagogue, if they did.

Riess: Yes, that is what I would expect, but I still have to ask it, because when you think of clubs you think of exclusiveness.

Murdock: Yes, well, the club was founded on the campus position that if you were faculty, you were automatically eligible to join. If you didn't care to ... I'd be always, in my early days being very loyal to the club, surprised that some of the women in some departments had no interest in joining. They were just not joiners, I guess.

Riess: But of that early list of people that were invited, some seventy-six faculty, and 120 associates from the community, they did get a remarkably high response.

Murdock: Yes, I think they did. I think the community of women, the head of the YWCA, Lily Margaret Sherman, and so forth, were pleased to be invited, and thought that it was a privilege to share the campus side of things. Of course, those of us in administration were pleased, I think, to be included in the early days. Josephine Smith and some of the dean's assistants were not academic and knew it, but it was nice to be counted in as part of the club.

That article that you had on the clubs in general--it is significant that each campus had a different pattern of membership.* Our club distinguished between the faculty ladies and the faculty women. The faculty ladies were the wives: they had their organization and were welcomed to use the Women's Faculty Club for their parties, which they did very amiably, but no women were eligible automatically because they were wives. To belong to the club you had to be also a faculty woman, which meant a working person more or less. You were taken in on your own distinction as contributing, rather than your husband's.

Riess: That is interesting that those two words could be so neatly defined.

Murdock: Well, it is kind of amusing, when it might have been just happenstance. It doesn't mean that women didn't consider themselves ladies, but they thought that their interests were not just--what is it in German? Kinder, Kirche, Küche, something like that.

I noticed that in the original constitution of the club it said that the purpose was "to promote mutual acquaintance and fellowship among women who are officers of instruction and government of the university." Then in the sixties, the primary purpose is "to promote and encourage educational and professional activities for women associated." In other words, it seemed that what was happening there was that they were moving from a more social to a more support-oriented group, by the sixties. Do you think, in fact, that was so?

Murdock: Perhaps so. It never was the sort of social center that other clubs were. We had parties in the early days and very gay ones, costume and fashion shows, and so forth. I don't think that it ever served as the social center.

*The Centennial Record of the University of California, 1967, UC Printing Department, pp. 230-231. See Appendices.

Murdock: People that liked to play bridge and dance and so forth did that in other groups. It didn't turn out to be the one social activity to occupy the campus community. I think that a good many of the people were just not interested in bridge parties and things of that sort. If they were, they did it through other organizations that they belonged to.

Riess: The question of other organizations came up early. In the first couple of years there was some discussion given to joining with the College Women's Club, or having affiliated relations with Mills or Stanford. Do you remember that?

Murdock: Not particularly. I think they were always on friendly terms with the other groups, but I don't think they expected to affiliate. I don't remember any really active discussion of mergers with the other clubs.

In the early twenties I think it was quite remarkable that so many women's groups did build club houses and get themselves established. Perhaps it was an aftereffect of World War I where women discovered that they could manage finances and take care of out of home activities, but when you think that the College Women's Club and the Women's City Club and two or three in San Francisco of the same variety, all really got under way in the same period, it sounds as though the modern women that feel they discovered independence had something to learn from the early twenties.

Riess: Do you think that the residence possibilities, that aspect, was very instrumental in all of this?

Murdock: Not particularly. I think that it was fortunate for quite a lot of us that the club was there as a residence, but I think most of the academicians preferred establishing their own homes. Some of them did stay at the club for a year or so while they were getting themselves established and perhaps being sure they were on the tenure ladder, and then they wanted to have their own homes.

Riess: Being sure they were one the tenure ladder, the old publish or perish?

Murdock: The responsibility was to establish themselves on the campus, and for the first year or so it was handy to be right in the middle of libraries and activities, the research centers of their field. But to have their own homes was something that most of them really wanted.

Riess: Earlier, you mentioned that there were the academic members, the administrative, and the faculty wives. Have wives continued to be asked to join? How has that been handled?

- Murdock: I think that memberships are acted upon, and any woman in the community of activity could be either proposed by somebody else, or could perhaps hint to somebody that she'd like to join, and would be acted upon. That includes faculty wives, if they are doing something besides just being a faculty wife. There have always been quite a few that have been quite active.
- Riess: That's what I wondered, whether you could think of some who added considerably to the club.
- Murdock: Mrs. Branch, who had the Bentley School, is one of the faculty wives that was a professional person and participated in club activities. I can't think of any that held office. I think the officers of the club have always been people on the campus payroll. That might have included faculty wives who were also campus employees, although that's rather rare, because they don't usually have two members of a family. But there was Mrs. Mary Cover Jones, in child development, psychology, some of the others who were joint campus staff as well as having husbands on the campus, but not too many of them.
- Riess: That's right. How about the wives of chancellors and presidents?
- Murdock: Oh, yes, they've automatically been invited.
- Riess: And have some of them been active?
- Murdock: Yes. Mrs. Sproul participated, and several of the deans' wives have been somewhat active in the club. That is true, they are exceptions to the rule of automatic membership, and they've used it for entertaining to a certain extent.
- Riess: Do they become a kind of sponsor of the club?
- Murdock: I don't think they've ever felt they had to be. The club has never expected that of them. They've used the club and been I think proud of it as one of the assets on the campus. But I don't think that they've felt that they had to do something just because they were members of the club.

11) Gifts and Friends

Riess: Can you remember the events surrounding the opening of the club in 1923? I know that a lot of very beautiful things were given to the club at that time. It seems also to coincide with the Berkeley fire--for instance the piano.

Murdock: From the Wheelers, yes.

Riess: But, as to the giving of beautiful objects and so on to the club when the club opened, was there a campaign?

Murdock: I do not think so particularly. As I said last time, some of those very lovely things in the living room, a few of them, were purchases that Hope Gladding made. I think that the club people, Miss Stebbins and others, set the example of giving some of the early treasures.

The book that has the history of some of our treasures, they were not all 1923, but quite a few of them were later gifts of faculty people that had lovely things that they wanted to share with the campus community. I think that it was a rather spontaneous sharing of some things, of treasures. Others were later memorials to different people. It was just very fortunate that we got off to a start of having attractive things that encouraged people to add to the supply.

Riess: Miss Julia George, "civic worker," tell me a bit about her.
[name associated with early gifts to the club]

Murdock: She was a very close friend of Lucy Stebbins. I think that it was through Lucy Stebbins that some of her lovely things came to the club. She was a San Francisco social worker. I get a little confused about how she got connected, whether because she was the sister of Henry George, but she was a very interesting person.

Riess: It was too late to have an association with Phoebe Hearst.

Murdock: Yes, but Mrs. Hearst's generosity, of course, started the Women's Gymnasium, and of course her funds provided everything from the Mining Building on through. But she was not--she didn't have really [any] connection with the founding of the Women's Faculty Club.

Riess: Were there other early benefactors to the club?

Murdock: I think the earliest woman regent, Mrs. Margaret Sartori in Los Angeles, took a generous supply of stock when the club was built. Later, Mrs. Stern gave porch furniture in her generous way. Mrs. Sartori's stock was eventually paid for, but I would say that she was one of the early patrons. But it hasn't depended on outside funds particularly; it was the members themselves who would come through if they ran short, which they very seldom did.

Murdock: One of the early influences was our first manager, Muriel Ransom, who bought the dishes when Hope was buying the other furniture, and set up the standard of dining room taste that has carried on through. She was a very close friend of Lucy Stebbins, and sister of the Ransom that had the Ransom School in Piedmont.

Riess: I wondered about what the relation--the Ransom and Bridges School.

Murdock: The Ransom and Bridges School was Marion Ransom. Her sister Muriel was connected with the school at one time, but also was at Mills as head of the dining department, and then came to the club and gave us our start setting up the kitchen and its standards of housekeeping.

One of the associate members was Florence Minard of Mills College, an art fellow student of Hope Gladding's, as was Mary Patterson, at the Rhode Island School of Design. Miss Minard was an associate member with a keen interest in the club. And at the time when the merger was proposed, she was really responsible in the developing of a scrapbook to show all of our treasures and all the important things that we had that ought to be preserved. I think she felt she did a good deal to keep the club as a separate entity by giving a little publicity to our treasures and our position and what we had had to represent what we learned and accomplished.

Riess: I understand Albert Bender was a great benefactor.

Murdock: Bender, of course, was just a darling and a very generous person. We are not the only beneficiaries of his generosity, because Stanford and Mills and other organizations have his memorials and great respect for all that he did for them too.

He was a friend of Miss Peixotto and some of the early people--I'm sure he was a very good friend of Dean Deutsch, who was friendly to the club. Albert Bender was just naturally generous about donating things to different organizations. He was our early male honorary member.

Riess: Did he enjoy the title and come and meet with you?

Murdock: Oh yes, he came and chuckled and smiled. I think he enjoyed it. He was a very friendly, open-hearted person. I think that pleased him very much to have that recognition.

Riess: Winfield Scott Wellington sounds like he did some work as a friend of the club.

Murdock: Yes, he was in the same department with Hope and was the architect of her house. Of course, he had wonderful taste, and appreciation of fine things. I think I told you he used to send his students over to see the collapsible table, the Chinese table that was the grandfather of library furniture of that type.

Riess: When he had the treasures assessed, was that as a friend, or did he do that as a paid consultant?

Murdock: No, I think that was as a friend. I don't think he was a paid consultant for that.

I think the club was very fortunate all along in having the support of the campus. I think President Sproul and Dean Deutsch had a very friendly attitude, pleased that the club existed and represented a certain quality that the other club didn't.

Riess: Can you remember, after the club was fully established and the men faculty had to reckon with you just right out their back door, how the interchange between the clubs was? After all, they had been far from charming when Dean Stebbins had originally wanted to join them.

Murdock: I think the Victorian men, you might say, I mean the Men's Faculty Club, was influenced in the early 1900s I suppose by Henry Morse Stephens and Gayley, and some of the ones that probably hadn't really an appreciation of women's positions on campuses. I think as time went on that attitude changed, and the men just accepted the fact that there were the two clubs.

I don't think there was any animosity between the clubs at any time to any extent.

Riess: No particular watershed times of the early days?

Murdock: No, I think they all went along quite amicably. I think probably the men's club was a little surprised that we managed to keep in the black when they were pretty perpetually in the red, but that's neither here nor there. [laughter] We were fortunate in having the guardians of the treasury, Miss Sperry and Miss Tabor, who were wanting to pay off our debts. I remember very well the annual meeting at which Agnes Fay Morgan dramatically burnt up the mortgage. It was pretty shortly after the club had started.

The men's club sort of suffered from bad debts. That didn't bother them too much. I think women dislike being in debt and just do all they can to keep out of it.

Riess: Yes, that is right. Well, they were told by their fathers always to pay cash.

Murdock: There may be something to that. That is a development of the fact that women are not supposed to be the big borrowers.

Riess: Yes, that is right. The club was always close to Cowell Hospital?

Murdock: The hospital in my college days was nearer to where, well, Morrison is, I guess. I remember when the new Cowell was built. The club was always quite near the infirmary, later Cowell Hospital. The women physicians were always responsible members of the club and cooperating.

I remember also occasionally for an annual meeting, when there wasn't a quorum, you could sort of summon somebody from across the way, medical help [laughter], to make your quorum.

Riess: I wondered how many women physicians there were.

Murdock: There were always women physicians, and they always were remarkable women. Dr. Cunningham was one of the early ones; before that Dr. Romilda Paroni Meads, and before that, Dr. Mary Ritter. There was always a woman physician.

Riess: I looked at the elections over the years. You became a director in 1932. Did you campaign at all?

Murdock: No, I think most of these things, you sort of took your turn. The last thing I ever expected was to have to act as president. I think Miss Espenschade, or somebody in physical ed who had a doctor's degree, and was academic, which was what they preferred for administrators of the club, she again was a dutiful daughter, and she had responsibilities and didn't feel she could take it. When you were elected to the board, the board decided who was which among the officers. I sort of became president by default. The club doesn't elect a president, it elects a board. Then the board assigns the duties.

12) Loyalty Oath, and War

Riess: How did the loyalty oath issue affect or not affect the Women's Faculty Club?

Murdock: I think they were very much disturbed about it, but there were not very many members who happened to be involved. One of the people, Margaret Peterson in art, was unwilling to sign the oath. I know that several of us bought pictures and so forth to help support her in her time of campus ostracism. But, I don't think that the club, as a club, got stirred up too much about it.

Riess: At the dinner table or the lunch table?

Murdock: Oh, I'm sure there was discussion of it. I don't think they got as upset as some of the men did, or some of the refugees from abroad who felt it was a sign that Hitler was taking over.

Riess: The women of the university have often been in the services. I wondered whether there was any coming and going of faculty club women that you can remember in the wars.

Murdock: Well, Katherine Towle became a colonel in the Marines, and I remember World War I, Miss Peixotto wanted me to go back to Washington to work for somebody back there. But that is a while back. It dates me as being more familiar with the agitation of World War I, than of World War II.

Riess: During this period did you roll bandages? Did the club get into that?

Murdock: We did it, but again, I remember that more for World War I than II, knitting and rolling bandages. I think one effect the war had was bringing more scholarly women out to Berkeley, so the club profited by having sabbatical people from Wellesley or Vassar or Smith, who came to study on the West Coast instead of going abroad as the temptation always had been. So it was an enrichment to the club.

Riess: Well then, of course, it also meant that more women came into professorial positions.

Murdock: Yes, a war does affect the demand and supply and so forth. There is a better chance to get established at a time when there isn't quite so much male competition.

Riess: Were you [the club] rationed? Did you eat Beans during the war?

Murdock: Oh, yes, we were rationed. We watched our sugar. I think the club has always had the miracle of having people that manage dining rooms successfully, and you don't suffer too much, you just do your patriotic duty and that's that.

13) Margaret Murdock, and Music

Riess: You have shared a home with Hope Gladding since 1940. You said it was designed by Winfield Scott Wellington. Did she commission him?

Murdock: Yes, he was a colleague of hers in the department. She asked him to do the house. I think he did a very successful job for her. He was so interested in Treasure Island and going over to the fair every day practically, that he procrastinated on his architectural business. She got a little impatient with him because she was so eager to move in. He was a little slow about tending to business, as architect. She forgave him, and they have always been good friends.

Riess: She was living in the club until that time?

Murdock: No, she was briefly in the club, thanks pretty largely to the delay of getting the house finished. When she first came, she had apartments or rooms and actually shared homes with several of the faculty people. She lived in the Wells's house and in the Schevill house.

Riess: Do you remember when the club was using the forestry bungalow?

Murdock: Well, yes, as a matter of fact I remember the forestry bungalow because if I had had four years in sequence on the campus I would have majored in music. Music, like home economics, was a kind of a semi-orphan field that the Greek professors were not particularly interested in, so its housing was kind of an afterthought. For a while it was in a cabin that was called forestry, and for a while the Music Department was just exactly where the Women's Faculty Club now stands. I mean that little piece of land was a little cottage.

I'm not sure that the forestry building was really much of a center. When it [Centennial Record] spoke about a room at Hearst Hall, they had some parties in the original Hearst Hall before the club was built. But, I think that the organizational meetings, as that article said, were mostly in the homes of the original people, like Miss Stebbins and Miss Peixotto.

Riess: And some at Town and Gown?

Murdock: Yes.

Riess: You remind me that I have separated you from all of your music. Had you studied music as a young child?

Murdock: Not too intensively. It was a broken-up childhood. I had piano lessons with Professor Julius Weber, who was a fine piano teacher in San Francisco. [N.B. He changed his name to Julian Waybur, but was Weber when he taught me. JMM] I didn't really go on with it. I think you need a more stablized childhood to get practicing in very faithfully.

Riess: You need a mother telling you to practice.

Murdock: I think that's what you need! Nobody ever was around to say it is time to do a little practicing.

Mr. Weber wasn't used to children as pupils. He took me on because he was fond of my parents. He really taught me fractions and long division, in quarter notes and half notes, because I was too young to have gotten to that point in arithmetic when I got to that point in music reading. So I can just see the little edge of a page with the pie cut into halves and quarters to show how you divided things up.

I liked singing. When I taught, I always had extra music classes. I think I would have liked to have been a music major, but that definitely had a four year sequence of harmony, counterpoint, and so forth. I wasn't willing to spend four years in that sequence, so I didn't major in music.

Riess: Why weren't you willing?

Murdock: Well, it didn't occur to me, I guess. I just was wanting to graduate. So, my music has been a hobby. I love it.

I have been lucky to have had the pleasure of playing the [Sather Tower] bells. I think that probably was partly--the Women's Faculty Club might be slightly responsible for it, because my first boss, Mr. King, who taught in the German Department, had had young man assistants, who were kind of irresponsible, and to have somebody that lived on the campus, at the Women's Faculty Club, who could be called upon on very short notice to fill in for him, was handy.

To have somebody, if you were to be there at ten minutes of eight you are there at ten minutes of eight, was handy because he had had predecessors that didn't have that sense of timing. So, I think that maybe being there at the club was a real reason why I got started to stay with the bells.

Riess: When was that that you started on it?

Murdock: In 1923.

Riess: Then did you just go as a sort of apprentice to him in the beginning?

Murdock: Yes, and you just sort of learn to play on the bells. There were only twelve bells in those early days. It wasn't the elaborate instrument that it is now.

14) The Parties

[Interview 3: May 14, 1982. Interview held at the Women's Faculty Club]

Riess: Miss Murdock, I wish you'd tell me about some of the parties at the club. From what I've heard, they were very inventive and elaborate.

Murdock: Well, the Christmas parties were really quite delightful. We had a chorus of ladies march in singing "Adeste Fideles" in proper Latin, wearing lovely colored robes and white--I don't think they call them wimples, but at any rate, medieval headdresses, like nuns. Not only some of the residents, but some of the associate members, like Mrs. Adams, Professor Adams' wife, were part of the chorus, and Alice Greer, who was in the placement office. We had a very excellent pianist to accompany us, and whatever the other program was, the choral group was featured, just as the men [The Faculty Club] had their Monks who were part of their Christmas party.

Riess: They were The Monks, and you were looking a little like nuns?

Murdock: It wasn't on purpose. They just had always had Monks, and we didn't really catch the idea [from that.] But this seemed to be appropriate, and we had our equipment for it. Year after year after year, our choral books and our nuns costumes. We marched with candles, and had to see that we didn't drip the wax on our robes or our hands! [laughs] But we were quite adroit.

Riess: Was there much rehearsing?

Murdock: We didn't have to rehearse for the chorus, but one year we did a mystery miracle play, the Towneley Play, and I happened to pick up the book to bring [today]. I was one of the shepherds, and I remember that we had a speech person here who said that I said, "Hail, our comely [pronounced calm-ly] one," instead of comely [pronounced come-ly] one. But I remember the play by remembering that Christine Price, the librarian, was the Third Shepherd, and did her,

"Hail, put forth thy dall,
I bring thee but a Ball.
Keep it, and play with it withal,
And go to the tennis."

Murdock: We had the most beautiful Mary, who was the daughter of Professor [Leon] Richardson. And I think the Father Joseph was one of the Physical Education Department people, who could make a very good man. For a long time we had her beard down in our costume trunk, in case we were ever going to do that same thing again.

Sometimes we had a speaker, or a reader of Christmas material. One of our best was Constance Steele's sister, Evelyn Little, who was out at Mills, a professor there, and who was a very expert reader and very adroit at finding different and interesting things to read.

But the Christmas parties were always fun, and Marian Moore, who accompanied us on the piano, was I think a minister's daughter and used to doing the Christmas carols with great gusto.

Riess: That was the old Wheeler piano?

Murdock: Yes, a treasure from the Wheeler estate.

Riess: Was it used much? Or is it?

Murdock: Quite a bit, because now we have several members who belong to the Music Department. It's been sporadic. There have been times when we have had programs of instrumental music, or different groups that have been here have made use of it. For several of the parties recently, somebody from the Music Department has played.

Riess: When you, a pianist, lived here, did you play the piano?

Murdock: Well, I didn't practice much. And I had my own little Steinway upstairs, which I seldom played, because my next door neighbor thought it was noisy. In fact, there were three pianos, at one time or another, on the top floor, and the person next to me for quite a while had a large grand piano that took up so much space that she practically had to sleep under the piano.

Riess: Who was she?

Murdock: She was a visiting scholar--I'm not quite sure, because her predecessor was very musical, and I didn't like to play in her presence, very often. I remember practicing for a wedding march once to play for a friend's daughter's wedding and she eventually thought I had mastered my little piece, but I think it took some time before it sounded proper to her.

And then we had a Chinese librarian who had her piano and was not any more expert than I was, and it was a little bit of a problem to have several pianos up on the third floor, and I think most of us began to feel we had better keep them quiet.

Murdock: But getting back to the parties, the first one that I remember was before the club was built. It was over at Hearst Gymnasium. That must have been in 1921 or 1922, because they had already invited associates, or administrative people, to supplement the early professional scholars. It was a costume party, of sorts, and Miss Fancher came as the Campanile, in cardboard. Hope Gladding was a Raggedy Ann, with her red braids. And somebody else was Barney's Beanery, like a sandwich board, advertising it--it was one of the popular eating places. I think I was the lady that was on the outside of the Baker's Chocolate can. I had a little mobcap and a little apron.

The most amusing costume that I can remember most vividly was Constance Grey, who was the secretary of the Chemistry Department, and Mrs. Branch, whose husband was in chemistry. They came as tramps, wearing Professor [Gerald E. K.] Branch's garden clothes, and [laughing] the campus police at the door wouldn't let them in for a while. But eventually they convinced him that it was a costume.

Riess: Nowadays people are often sort of ambivalent about bothering to get into costumes.

Murdock: I know. In those days it was being done, I guess. And we even learned all our parts for the Miracle Plays. It was Mrs. [Sara Hunstman] Sturgess who coached us. We did "The Owl and the Pussycat," and "The Bishop of Rum-ti-poo." One of the physical ed people turned somersaults. And we had a very effective owl and pussycat that went to sea in a peagreen boat.

Another one I remember that was fun was our hat parties. You didn't have to have a whole costume, but you wore a hat and people were supposed to guess what books you were representing. I can date that part because it was a time when you could do Fashion is Spinach, or The Egg and I, which were both good hat titles! People enjoyed dressing up and using their imagination for things of that sort. And people didn't watch t.v. or have as many diversions; you made your own entertainment.

They had a lovely Living Pictures party that Miss [Mary] Patterson, I think, masterminded. I remember vividly that Miss Stebbins' mother, Mrs. Stebbins, who was a really proper person for it, did "Whistler's Mother" most effectively. I don't remember the other tableaux for that party, but it was a very charming party and took a good deal of planning.

Riess: When did people start doing Living Pictures?

Murdock: Oh, I think that was probably from Victorian days. It was lots of fun, because people could do a Breughel or something or other quite effectively.

I think for that one they used the small dining room as the stage, and the audience was in the hall. Usually the library was the stage, or the performance would be just at one end of the living room.

I remember one in which there was a domestic scene, and the man of the house in it was dressed up properly, and I was driving her home and we were down on the campus and for some reason got stopped and she was very embarrassed to be in this masculine costume, and it was all very amusing because the campus policeman looked a little startled.

Riess: Did you do skits, where the members wrote the lines?

Murdock: I can't remember particularly. We might have, but I don't seem to remember using people's talents. There were people who could have done it; Barbara Nachtrieb was very active in dramatics in college, took the lead in "Parthenia" and so forth, but I don't seem to remember her, as a law professor, getting out of that character for dramatics here. Not that she couldn't have, but I think she was busy with other things. Possibly she had a small child then, and at the time that we were going into such frivolity, she was otherwise engaged!

Riess: Traditionally there was the Christmas party, and then what other times of year?

Murdock: The Annual Dinner was always an event, with an excellent speaker, quite often Miss Coulter of the library, who was one of the wittiest speakers that you could imagine. That was an occasion for your formal clothes and for recognizing new members, having them introduced, and not too succinctly, enough so that we really would know them. That was an occasion that you got out your finery for.

I remember once when two people appeared in identical dresses, to everybody's embarrassment. One had bought hers in Nevada. I think the people here, at Sather Gate Apparel and so forth, wouldn't sell things that were twins to people that might meet at the same parties. But this was an innocent buying of her evening dress in another town and then finding its duplicate at the party. They both were at the speaker's table!

Riess: This would be a dress you might wear to the opera?

Murdock: Oh, yes! And of course some of them--"Lenty" [May Lent] had a long blue lace that turned up every year. She didn't bother to get a new one. It was pretty, and she only wore it once a year. She kind of joked about it. But it got a little monotonous.

Riess: "Lenty." People tended to have those nicknames.

Murdock: Yes, although people had their dignity. I went to memorial services for Emily Huntington, who was one of our earliest distinguished members, and one of her colleagues spoke of how long it took to call her even Miss Huntington, rather than "Professor," and I think he never did get to "Emily."

Riess: Names like "Smitty" for Josephine Smith. How about you?

Murdock: I was just Margaret.

Riess: And Dean Stebbins? Very formally addressed?

Murdock: Yes, I knew her from early days, but it was awfully hard. She finally told me, "Can't you say 'Lucy'?"

Riess: And Dean Davidson?

Murdock: She was called "Bobbie," and I don't know why.

When I think of the early people connected with parties and things, I believe I hadn't spoken before of Margaret Beattie. She was one of our early members who was very helpful in decorations for parties and so forth. She didn't dress up and act to the same extent as some of the others, but her brother Douglas had a beautiful voice, and he often sang at our Christmas parties, and it would be something that you would remember with great pleasure.

In fact, we often did have male performers, like Douglas Beattie, to sing. There was no reason for not, if there was somebody in the family who could contribute that way.

Riess: People brought their children to parties?

Murdock: Yes, we have quite a few that remember the club from their childhood days, but there weren't too many members of the club that had them.

We had someone here whose grandchildren came, and they were racing along in the corridor upstairs, and the older one said to the younger, "You mustn't make so much noise. This is a sort of a hospital." [laughter]

Riess: Did The Monks ever come entertain you at the club?

Murdock: I think once or twice, but it wasn't a tradition. We often had a campus group of singers, and we had the Boy's Chorus [of San Francisco] one time.

Riess: Just as an activity, did the residents do play readings?

Murdock: Not to any great extent. I think there were times when they wanted to be more social than they probably needed to to keep their members interested in the club, having bridge, or having dance or something. But there weren't enough members interested in that, and if they had that interest, or with their husbands, in other groups, that was fine. It was attempted here as a way to keep the members together, but it never really took, particularly. They were busy with their own professional affairs, and those that liked bridge played it with couples at their own homes or elsewhere. But the club didn't become a factor in that type of entertainment, I would say.

Then as time went on, people went home at five o'clock, as it were, and the club wasn't a place that they would gather at night for parties. I think the time comes when transportation or safety are factors. The club, of course, used to serve dinners and thrived on it. But the time came when so few people came that it wasn't financially sensible.

Riess: Who were the main guiding lights for the parties? You, for one.

Murdock: I think all of us enjoyed that sort of frivolity in the early days, but I think the younger ones that came in didn't think of it as a social center to the same extent that it was true in the very early days.

Riess: The Depression, the wars, would affect that?

Murdock: Yes, I think so. People got more serious about things. If you wanted to exercise your sense of frivolity it wouldn't be through the club.

Riess: Dressing as tramps, when people were begging in the streets.

Murdock: They [the costumed tramps] were very effective! One of them had a tooth painted out black. Humorous and unusual then, in the days when women never wore pants!

You spoke of the war. We had our Victory Garden. We had a parking lot over here, but it did have some space around it, and we had several residents who got busy planting vegetables and feeding us, and even one of the maids had her little plot and helped grow things. I think there are some amusing pictures somewhere of people out in their Victory Garden. But I don't think they'd do that now, even if there was space.

Riess: Why?

Murdock: The present residents are mostly visiting scholars, and not treating it as a home [the club].

Riess: In the older days, visiting dignitaries who stayed at the club moved right into the homey atmosphere?

Murdock: They accepted that, though they didn't always participate. It is true of visitors in any home. Some get in and wash the dishes, and others don't

We had here the person who wrote Mary Poppins. And I remember being very thrilled to go upstairs once and find that Catherine Drinker Bowen was there. And I enjoyed particularly the summers that Madame [Alice] Ehlers was doing harpsichord concerts and would be here for several weeks. She enjoyed the club very much and came back for several years when she was concertizing here.

We had English writers, and we had a very interesting Jewish scholar from Jerusalem. I remember I played some music for her in the Tower, and the next morning when I was in the office, in she came with a charming little tray--one of these black plastic things with coins set in it, Hebrew coins in it, and she gave it to me as a sort of a thank you for playing her music.

It was fun on the Tower to serenade some of our visiting people. There was somebody who had been here in anthropology and gone to Hawaii, so when she was back from Hawaii on a visit, I played "Aloha" and various things for her. That was part of the fun of knowing who was here, doing a little something on the bells to surprise them.

[continuing discussion of visiting scholars and the club] I think with our visiting people now it still happens that people pick their brains about their fields, take advantage of their willingness to share their expertise. It's been a blessing for the club. It probably operates more at the breakfast table than elsewhere, though when we've had our Lunch and Learn programs we have quite often invited short term residents to share their experiences.

One of the people who sent us [recommended staying at the club] several interesting people was Professor [George] Papenfuss in botany, who came from South Africa and knew scholars all over the world. Whenever any women scholars in his field were in this vicinity, he saw to it that they stayed here. He sent such nice people!

Agnes Robb, Administrative Secretary to President Sproul, 1951

Agnes Robb
 January 20, 1982
 Interviewed at her home

1) The Founders of the Women's Faculty Club

Riess: Miss Robb, you have certainly been a member of the Women's Faculty Club long enough to have clear memories about its founders. Tell me about them, please.

Robb: The founding members of the Women's Faculty Club, like the Founding Fathers of our nation, were brilliant women of the time who were leaders in their chosen fields.

In 1919 the Women's Faculty Club was the brainchild of Lucy Ward Stebbins, the daughter of a distinguished San Francisco Unitarian minister. Perhaps the best characterization of her is to quote from the honorary degree conferred upon her by the president of the University of California at the 1953 commencement.

Dean of Women on this campus for almost three decades, and for most of those years Professor of Social Economics. Active in the establishment of the Schools of Nursing and Social Welfare, and in their sound educational development. A teacher and dean "indu'd with sanctity of reason," who saw clearly into the hearts and minds of students, and stimulated them by precept and example to achieve their highest potential. No single individual has contributed more to the personal and general welfare of the University's women, and few have touched helpfully so many phases of our University life.

Jessica Peixotto, a colleague and a good friend of Dean Stebbins, called together several women leaders on the campus to consider the formation of a faculty group. They became the nucleus of the founders of the club.

Miss Stebbins had no peer in her field.

Riess: As dean of women did Miss Stebbins have a chance to do any teaching at all?

Robb: Oh, yes, she taught and I still see former members of her classes.

I remember if Dean Putnam, the dean of men who handled student affairs, had a disciplinary problem, an intercampus or community problem, he always consulted Dean Stebbins. He told me he would never think of coming to a conclusion without consulting Dean Stebbins.

Miss Pexiotto was the second woman to get a Ph.D. and the first woman full professor at the University of California. She was active in all phases of economics, and especially in child welfare, and wrote extensively. She was the eldest of six children, and the only girl in a prominent Bay Area family.

Barbara Nachtrieb Armstrong (Barbara Grimes in the early days), was another distinguished faculty woman. President Clark Kerr in conferring an honorary degree said, in part, of her:

Distinguished by the breadth and depth of your teaching and research in law and economics . . . with a sustained interest in the law affecting the more dependent sections of the community. An authority on family law and community property.

She was known beyond the boundaries of the state. She was prominent in her college days as beautiful, talented, and brilliant. She participated in the formulation of the social security program, and worked closely with Chester Rowell in the set up of the state health program. She was professor of law and the first woman law professor in any major university.

Riess: Formidable combination!

Robb: Oh, she was just really a very unusual person: beautiful, as I said, and very bright. As a matter of fact, she told a story: John Simpson, who received the University Medal in the class of 1913, thought he should split it in half for Barbara because she should have had the [honor]. Barbara told me also that some of the professors had said that, but she was a woman so she didn't get it. John Simpson was enamored with her for many years.

Riess: Tell me about Agnes Fay Morgan. What kind of a person was she?

Robb: Agnes Fay Morgan - "Eminent biochemist, pioneer in the development of the science of nutrition . . . Your university today honors your extraordinary contributions to the advancement of knowledge in your chosen field," so said President Clark Kerr in conferring her honorary degree.

Robb: She was a delightful person. She was the one who discovered Vitamin B to keep our hair from getting grey. She was a great--I guess I can't coin a word--she was great on vitamins. She had a son. I think she came from the state of Washington. She was interested in wines too, and became a member of the Wine Institute composed almost entirely of men. I'm not certain this is the correct name.

Riess: Yes, that is.

Robb: I remember Vice-President [Claude] Hutchison asking me one time for suggestions for a certain committee. I was giving suggestions, and I don't think they amounted to much. Then I said, "Agnes Fay Morgan." He was looking for a man. Then I said, "Why don't you put on a woman? There is Agnes Fay Morgan." "Oh! She is just like one of us!" So she was. Her field, of course, was largely a field where men were predominant.

She was active in Davis as well. She wasn't in home economics, I have forgotten what the department was called. [household science]

Agnes Fay Morgan I knew well and admired. Her hair was very auburn and reddish, and there was always the talk, "You know, I think she dyes it. You know, I don't think that the vitamins did it." She laid great stress on the fact that that was possible. I said, "Gee, I am practically grey. How about doing something for me?" She said, "Oh, I should have had you a long time ago to do anything."

She told me a story about Admiral Byrd. She met him at some occasion. The question of vitamins came up. He was going on one of his expeditions and asked her to set up a menu for the trip which was to extend over months. She did, and it was highly vitamin included. The trip was very successful the whole time, with no trouble at all healthwise. So that is a contribution. I don't know how well that is known.

Riess: That is very interesting. Why did he ask her? What was the connection?

Robb: Well, they met at some kind of an affair, or their paths crossed. Maybe he was concerned as to, "What do I feed these men when we get down there?" I don't know. Anyway, this was a personal interview with her and him. He asked her then to do this and she did. They had no trouble whatsoever the whole time.

Riess: What really did Dean Hutchison mean when he said, "Oh, she is just like one of us?"

Robb: It meant that she is just part of the discussion. "We don't pay any attention to whether she is a woman, it is what she has to offer."

Riess: Speaking of the founders of the club, who was Margaret Beattie?

Robb: Margaret Beattie was a professor of bacteriology. She was one of the founders.

Riess: She was one of the charter members, I know. I have a little list here.

Robb: And she was one of the last to die. I think perhaps Katherine Bishop was the last of the founders.

Miss Beattie was beloved by students. She was ready at any time to help a student in trouble, financial or otherwise. Soon after Mr. Sproul became president he appointed a group of faculty men and women to serve as advisors to students not fraternity or sorority members, to help orient those from out of town. This plan was discontinued and the dean of students enlarged their activities.

Riess: What did those early founders represent to other women in the university community?

Robb: I think, Miss Stebbins, Miss Peixotto and Mrs. Armstrong were for women's rights, but not as we know of women's rights today. They were forerunners. They had their place but they had to earn it, and compete, very definitely compete.

Miss Edith Coulter was one of the club founders. I think she was a head librarian. She wasn't head of the school or the main library--it was Mr. Leupp and later Mr. Coney--but she was maybe the reference librarian. She was a very competent person, somewhat like Miss Stebbins, very severe. She had a very subtle sense of humor. I am not sure Miss Stebbins had a sense of humor. She had a sense of friendliness, and a warmth that came eventually, but Miss Coulter had a very subtle and good sense of humor.

Miss Coulter was librarian when I was in college. She patrolled the main reference library. "Put on your mask!" and you put on your mask when she told you. It was during the flu epidemic of 1918. If there was any conversation in the library, she would march down the hall with great authority and say, "No talking in the library!" She meant it and you knew she meant it. It was the old school teacher [type]. But she was a fine person. She made great contributions to the club in its administration.

Sarah Davis was one of the very first five or six founders. She was treasurer for many, many, many years. I don't know how to characterize her without defaming her. I don't want to say a little old lady, because she wasn't an old lady, but she was a little spinster, a very definitely old time spinster lady who was most Robb: devoted to the club, most accurate about everything, and served it very well. She was quiet and shy but very effective. Evidently she was one who could contribute much because the Stebbins-Peixotto people drew her in from the very first. I have forgotten what her field was.

Riess: She was a person for whom the club was very important then.

Robb: Oh yes, I think the club was her life, probably.

The ones who contributed the most to the ornamentation in the club were Mary Patterson and Hope Gladding.

Riess: You mean as far as acquiring beautiful things?

Robb: Yes, and in arranging. That is, she [Mary] would do that.

Riess: What about Hope Gladding?

Robb: As far as I remember, and this may not be accurate, Mary Patterson was more active than Hope Gladding in my days. That's an impression.

2) Membership

Riess: What has your role been in the club?

Robb: I have always been a supporter. I used the dining room frequently and contributed when somebody died to the memorial fund. I think only once did I serve on a committee, which didn't do what I had hoped they would.

Riess: What was that committee:

Robb: That was, they would invite certain community members who were distinct in a profession or a community service as honorary members of the club. It fell flat. Somewhere along the line, I think, the policy has changed and they elect prominent community women.

Riess: I wonder if that fell flat because of the presence of the Berkeley Women's City Club and other alternative clubs.

Robb: No, I don't think so, I haven't any recollection of that. I think the main thing was that the committee felt that it was strictly a university affair and that they shouldn't go outside the University.

My intention [in this interview] was to speak only of the individuals and not of the club because I was not intimately connected with the activities of the club.

Riess: I noticed in your earlier oral history you said that in college you hadn't been much of a joiner.* You felt that that was, in a way, a mistake.

Robb: It was. I am not a joiner, generally. I belong to the Berkeley Clinic Auxiliary and I served in that as treasurer and secretary and archivist. Then I was retired. At least Mr. Sproul had retired and I had less and less and less to do. That is about the only thing that I really have participated in. Socially, yes, but not administratively, so to speak.

Riess: I wondered, in relation to the Women's Faculty Club, whether you felt that because of your particular position, that it was just somehow inappropriate for you to be too involved.

Robb: No, no. As a matter of fact, I don't know how I became a member, because in the early days you had to be a faculty member.

Riess: Margaret Murdock was not faculty, and neither was Josephine Smith.

Robb: But Josephine Smith didn't come in until sometime later. Margaret came in in 1921. Hope Gladding was active in the early days. I don't know whether her [Margaret Murdock's] connection was as close to Hope in those days as now.

I asked Miss Smith the other day, I said, "I guess I am the oldest member of the club." I thought probably I was. I didn't realize Margaret Murdock was such an early member, because she was active as well as employed in the club.

Smitty, as she was affectionately known in the president's office, said, "Oh, no. I am older than you are." I said, "I meant an earlier member of the club." She said, "Oh, Sproul got you in the club." Well, he didn't.

Riess: Among the earliest members of the club were librarians. Librarians are not faculty.

Robb: No, but they were in a status all their own. Their faculty titles were changed later in the Sproul administration, I think. [1963]

Riess: You say you don't feel that Dr. Sproul pushed you in?

Robb: I know he didn't, because he was just, oh, very careful. He [used] no influence whatsoever.

*Agnes Roddy Robb, Robert Gordon Sproul and the University of California, an oral history interview conducted 1973-1974, Regional Oral History Office, The Bancroft Library, University of California, Berkeley, 1976.

Riess: So you weren't sent to the club as the president's spy?

Robb: Oh, no. Did somebody say that?

Riess: No, I just had that idea, to find out what the women were thinking.

Robb: No, well, as a matter of fact, I don't think I was thinking very much. But, I did enjoy the club as a dining room.

Is anybody talking about Miss Ranson? Somebody should.

Riess: I have heard that those were great days under her management. I would like to hear more about that.

Robb: Well, when I joined the club Miss Ransom was the manager. I guess she ran the club in every way, administratively as well as the dining room. The dining room was a tea room of the highest order. On and off they would serve dinners depending on labor conditions; it wasn't always luncheon and dinner. The menus and the cooking were delightful. The meals were beautifully prepared and beautifully served.

Riess: Was it always students who served?

Robb: Probably, most of the time they did. It was a good source of income for the students.

Riess: What kind of a woman was Miss Ransom?

Robb: Well, she was, shall I say, a maiden lady? Very elegant in her appearance. She wasn't a style person necessarily. She looked like a lady in every sense of the word and was. She ran the Ransom School. She came out of there. Some of the members of the club were from the Ransom School: Katherine Towle and Eleanor Gardner, and who else? I can't think offhand; perhaps Patricia Sizer.

Riess: Josephine Miles used the term "blue stockings" about some of the early club women.

Robb: Well, I know the term but I don't ever remember it used on the campus. I suppose they would have been the founders, Olga Bridgman, Hope Gladding and Mary Patterson among later leaders in the club. I thought of them as socially prominent and effective women.

Riess: When you talk about socially prominent, do you...?

Robb: That is, socially prominent in the club. Our leaders. Leader would be a better word than socially prominent. The club was not a social organization at any time.

Riess: Was it quite consciously not social?

Robb: I think so. "Lunch and Learn," and the retirement parties are relatively recent.

Riess: Earlier they would have avoided bridge lunches and all of that sort of thing?

Robb: Yes, oh yes. You see, they were faculty women. In those early days they had to be faculty. If administrative, you probably were of faculty qualifications. It was definitely the Women's Faculty Club.

Riess: But why wouldn't these faculty women have enjoyed a place where they could just be social?

Robb: Miss Stebbins, of course, had a social life of her own. I think they all had social lives of their own.

Riess: I see. The women who were the residents in the club, that was different.

Robb: There weren't very many residents. There were three, four or five, and they stayed on for several years after they retired. They finally had to leave. These were Mary B. Davidson, and May Dornin and Lucille Czarnowski.

Mary B. Davidson was dean of women. She lived at the club after the Berkeley fire in 1923. Her house was burned down and I think she lived in the club from then on. She became dean of women, succeeding Lucy Stebbins.

Riess: I don't know whether the idea was to have the residents as a way of making money for the club, or whether it was a way to serve the women faculty who needed a place to live. Which do you think?

Robb: I think that was it.

Riess: To serve.

Robb: Yes, because I don't think they took graduate students until later.

See, all of those were members of the faculty, or top administrative offices like Mrs. Davidson. First she was assistant to Dean Stebbins for many years, and it was an excellent combination because Miss Stebbins was a stately person in appearance--not in personality, but in appearance and in her relations she was commanding in appearance. Mrs. Davidson was just the opposite. She was the light, social, friendly person. So it was a beautiful combination. It went on for many years, I guess until Miss Stebbins retired.

3) The Club During the Depression, and the Loyalty Oath

Robb: Another member from relatively far back is Ruth Okey, who is still alive and worked under Agnes Fay Morgan. They were entirely different types of people. Ruth Okey had some part in the club later on. I think the club ran into menu difficulties, perhaps during the war, and they were seeking information, and they called on Ruth Okey for help.

Riess: Because of rationing they were unable to get what they needed?

Robb: Yes.

Riess: How did the club manage during those periods of crisis: the war, the Depression, the loyalty oath?

Robb: In the Depression I think that they must have lost a number of members. I know Blanche Miller, who went in presumably about the same time I did because we worked in the controller's office at the same time--and we always ate on Tuesdays--she resigned because she had to curtail.

Only once were the university salaries cut. They were restored after one year, probably the only place in the country where that occurred.

Riess: You mean the only place in the country where they were actually cut?

Robb: No, where they were cut and restored so quickly.

Riess: You are saying that it was so tight that somebody would resign their membership just to save the two or three dollars a month?

Robb: I guess so. I know she said, "Oh, well, there are other things." That is the only one I know. I don't think there was a massive exit.

Riess: During the loyalty oath, do you remember the club being a place where there was a lot of discussion and concern about that?

Robb: Oh, I am sure there was. I don't think that it was organized discussion. I know I was always being approached by faculty on both sides of the problem. I'd come back to Mr. Sproul and say, "Oh, I'm scared."

"You are doing all right, you are doing all right."

Riess: They'd want you to tell him what they thought.

Robb: Yes.

Riess: Well, he might have been interested to find out.

Robb: Yes, he was. He'd say, "Well, that's all right, you are doing fine."

"Oh, but I don't know!" I was scared!

Riess: Well, I am sure that they probably would ask you, "Now, what does he think? What is he doing?"

Robb: I know that some of the men talked to me. Professor [Robert] Brode was one very early in the days. Maybe I didn't do well by Professor Brode. They would talk, you know, and maybe I didn't sell their bill of goods enough because I am not always articulate.

Riess: They probably thought they could talk Agnes into something or other. How did you deal with that, when people buttonholed you and said, "You know, I want you to tell Bob Sproul this?"

Robb: Well, he always had a ready ear. I tried to be correct in transmitting it. I don't know. I was a channel of communication. There is no question about that. I felt that I was. He felt that I should be, too, because I had his interest at heart first. You never know how much the other fellow is working for himself through you.

4) President Sproul, and Women at the University

Riess: Did President Sproul have any particular attitude toward the Women's Faculty Club?

Robb: Yes, he did. He was interested in the club, but he and Mrs. Sproul felt the President's House should be used in place of our facilities. There was a time when he had some funds. I don't think the club rose to the occasion. They did something for the kitchen. I am sure they could have had more, but they didn't seem to be interested at the time, or didn't know how to present it or something.

Riess: About what time do you think that would have been?

Robb: Well, it would have been during the time he was president, so it would have been the middle fifties maybe. Anyway, they got a sizable sum for the kitchen. I have forgotten. Catharine Quire, I think, was active in the thing. They seemed to be satisfied that that was enough. He said, to me, "Well, do you think that is all right?"

I said, "Well, they haven't come up with anything." I was not promoting anything within the club. I was the channel of communication between the two. I tried to maintain that position always.

Riess: It never occurred to them to take advantage of this opening wedge.

Robb: No, I don't think so.

Riess: That is interesting, because later on they really needed money. I guess maybe in the fifties they didn't feel they did.

Robb: Well, I can't pinpoint the time because I space my time: in California Hall and in Sproul Hall. It was "before and after" California Hall in my later life.

Riess: In my letter I said to you, "What do you recollect of the administration's view of the club? Was it amused and tolerant, or respectful, or uninterested?" What was President Sproul's attitude toward faculty women?

Robb: He was strong for faculty women. I think in my book I tried to make the point that it was beyond him.* He was criticized for not appointing more women on the faculty, but they had to come up through the prescribed faculty procedure. So there was a certain aversion to women. They had to compete, and the leaders of the Women's Faculty Club did, you see.

Riess: There was a large segment of physical education people who were in the club in those days. I wondered whether they were academic.

Robb: Yes, they were, but they had a different title. It is somewhat like the business tools. I think when I was in college, at least right after I was in college, there was the question of typewriting and stenography being given in the Economics Department. That was ruled out. I think physical education was on a higher level, but somewhat the same. It was a vocation rather than a profession.

Riess: That is exactly the dichotomy: vocation, profession.

Robb: But they regarded themselves as academic and I think they were members of the senate. I am not sure.

Riess: Well, there were certainly a lot of them.

Robb: Oh yes, well, they were a department of women. I think physical ed was a required subject. You see, there was men and women. In the Sproul administration they were joined together, which was a movement somewhat favorable to the recognition of women, let's say. Although I am not sure they didn't think they were put down.

*See Robb oral history, cited p. 72.

5) Lunch

Riess: You said that on Tuesdays you had lunch with...?

Robb: Blanche Miller.

Riess: Yes, with Blanche Miller. Now, did you have other particular days of the week that you would meet people there?

Robb: Oh, I used to eat with the deans regularly, but not obligated; that is, not the first Tuesday or the second Friday or something, but two or three times a week. There was Ruth Donnelly and Bobbie [Dean Mary B.] Davidson, and Marion Morrow who was Ralph Merritt's sister-in-law, and an intimate friend of Bobbie Davidson and perhaps was her guest.

Riess: This group would just be there, and when you arrived you would sit with them?

Robb: Yes. Sometimes I would call, "Are you going to be there?" Ruth Donnelly, later president of the club, has since died. Also, Catherine Quire was the other, and she has died. She was dean of women too. Sometimes Katherine Towle, but not always.

Riess: What did you do, talk business at lunch?

Robb: Oh no, we just gabbed. Sometimes it was club gossip. No, no it was social. They were all friends who met.

Riess: You wouldn't be likely to arrive there at noon saying, "Oh, what a morning we have had, such and such is blowing up."

Robb: Oh, yes, maybe. Well, Ruth Donnelly and Mary Davidson very often would. Ruth wasn't in the same department but her business was related to the students. She was a good president of the club.

Riess: What do you think makes a good president of the club?

Robb: A good administrator and a good speaker.

Riess: The matter of being a good fundraiser apparently has not been an issue.

Robb: No, I don't recall it was ever an issue. As a matter of fact, the dues, I think, are ridiculously small. Now, apparently it is doing very well financially.

Riess: Josephine Smith said to me that when she went to the club she would always put herself behind a magazine because she wanted the club to be an hour when she was free.

Robb: Smitty sat by herself with the Saturday Evening Post when an Agatha Christie story would come out. I think it was Agatha Christie. Whoever it was, she would have to read that. Then she took to skating and she would come with her book and she'd read and practice the steps under the table. She's quite a "gal." That's very true. She would go and sit by herself. Nobody dared even say "good morning." She was engrossed.

Riess: If you didn't go there, you would just go to lunch on Telegraph Avenue?

Robb: Yes, I belonged to the Berkeley City Club and I used to go down there occasionally.

1) Library Career

Riess: When did you graduate from the university?

Dornin: In 1921.

Riess: When did you first become aware of the Women's Faculty Club?

Dornin: I worked my way through college because my father had died and I had to have some [financial] help. I was very, very lucky to get a job in the library as a student assistant. The job I had was putting those little labels on the backs [spines] of books, and then writing the "call numbers" on them. That was in the catalog department.

At the end of the catalog room, at the end of the library too, there is a cloakroom for the women staff. Well, when I would be coming in with my coat, to put my coat away, why perhaps Miss [Edith] Coulter, and Miss [Pauline] Gunthorp or Miss [Nella Jane] Martin or so on, might have been at a meeting the night before about this, and they'd be talking about it. Of course, I didn't stand there to listen to it, but if I was there a bit I'd overhear this--I knew that something was doing. And the other student assistants, they would hear odds and ends. This was during the year 1919.

What was happening was that the women were getting very upset because the men--you see, oh, it was so macho in those days. In the men's club [The Faculty Club], no women could come in, unless they were escorted by a man, and they could only come on very special occasions. You know, they had a "ladies night" or something like that, and then faculty women were admitted and the faculty wives could come with their husbands. Or, once in a while, if it was some important visitor, they might have a dinner and they might invite the wives of the deans or the most highly positioned women, such as Dean Stebbins.

Riess: But the faculty women?

Dornin: But the faculty women couldn't go, although it was a faculty club, not a men's faculty club, a faculty club.

Now Miss [Lucy] Stebbins, I think, was one of the earliest people to talk about it, because being dean of women, as she was, from 1913 to 1936, everything that had to do with the women she was very keen about. Her own student women, she didn't like the way we were treated either. There were lots of things that we couldn't do; the boys had things that we didn't have, as women.

For instance, when I entered the university in the fall of 1915, the center of ASUC activities was the high, concrete basement of North Hall, which stood where The Bancroft Library now stands. The student book store occupied the south end of the basement, the Daily Californian and other student offices, the north end. In between was an area known as "The Joint." It contained a barber shop, a shoe shine stand and a lunch counter. "The Joint" was sacred to the men students. Women students who did not live near enough to walk home for lunch, either carried it, or went to a public restaurant off campus.

It was not until 1923, when Henry Morse Stephens Hall, the first student union, was built, that there was a centrally located lunch counter, on campus, open to both men and women.

Riess: Was Dean Stebbins militant, would you say?

Dornin: I wouldn't say so, because of all the gentle and sweet-tempered people you ever met in your life, it was Lucy Stebbins. She wasn't the kind that was militant, but she was concerned. That's a better word for it. She was very concerned over the place that the women had on the faculty.

Of course, when The Faculty Club was formed, there weren't so many women on the campus. But by 1913 or so, when she became dean, there were, oh, 4,800 students on the campus, of which perhaps eighteen hundred were women. So, I think she was one of the first people who began to think about it. And, as I say, these library women were talking about it.

Now, Mrs. Agnes Fay Morgan--Agnes Fay Morgan was assistant professor in the Division of Nutrition in the College of Agriculture, and when it became a department, and came into the College of Letters and Science, she became head of the department--she had a Ph.D., which Miss Coulter didn't have, and neither did Miss Stebbins. She had a Ph.D., so she could stand up a little bit more.

Dornin: Then, there was also Dr. [Jessica] Peixotto, with a Ph.D. in economics. She was the first woman to become a full professor, in 1918. Now, that was just about the time when they were talking about building the Women's Faculty Club. Here she was, a full professor, and she couldn't go to The Faculty Club. So she had some reason to feel that way. So did Dr. Bridgman, who was an M.D. and a Ph.D. She came on the campus in 1915 in the Department of Psychology, Olga Bridgman.

Riess: Did these women want the club as a residence, or was a place to meet?

Dornin: A place to meet. How much they talked about residence, I don't know. None of them that I've spoken about so far ever lived in the place. They had homes of their own.

I was just a student in 1919 when they were talking about it. In 1923, when it was built, I was off the campus. You see, I started to get a secondary credential, for teaching, but then when I was a junior the Library School was established. By that time I had enough work in libraries to know that I liked that very much. I wasn't so sure I was going to like teaching, but when I first came in, there wasn't much else open; there were so few jobs open to women then.

When I first came to the University, Mr. [Joseph C.] Rowell was the librarian. When he retired in 1919, Mr. [Harold] Leupp was made librarian. Mr. [Sidney B.] Mitchell was ambitious to be something better than head of the order department, but Mr. Leupp and Mr. Mitchell were too near the same age for Mr. Mitchell to stand around waiting for Mr. Leupp to retire, so he had to do something on his own, either leave Berkeley, which he didn't want to do, or find another position. At the time, there were no accredited library schools west of the Mississippi River. Here was an opportunity for Mr. Mitchell--to establish a library school at the University of California. However, such a proposal would have to meet the approval of both the Academic Senate and the Board of Regents, and a great deal of preliminary planning would have to be done. Mr. Mitchell must have had this idea in mind for a long, long time and have done his "home work," so to speak.

When the Announcement of Courses for the fall semester 1919 appeared that summer, there was the addition of a Department of Library Science in the College of Letters and Science, with Mr. Mitchell as chairman of the department.

Up to this point, I had not thought of becoming a librarian. But with the opportunity suddenly in front of me, knowing that I definitely liked the work and was not so sure of teaching, I went after it. Eventually, I received a certificate in librarianship in Dornin: June, 1922. There were two or three jobs open on the library staff. I had been a student assistant for seven years and worked in almost every department. I hoped for one of the jobs, but Mr. Leupp said his library "was not a finishing school for Mr. Mitchell's library students." So, I had to get out and "cut my library teeth" on a job outside.

Riess: And when did you get back to Berkeley?

Dornin: In February, 1926, there was a senior assistant job in the catalog room. I was still in my twenties, and it was unusual--nobody was a senior assistant at that time until she was thirty-five years old--but I think that Miss Gunthorp was behind it.

Riess: And were you invited to join the Women's Faculty Club, as a senior assistant librarian?

Dornin: Yes. But this was one thing that I thought was strange about the club: they were so keen on getting things done for the women, but they were awfully snooty about who came into the club. The junior assistants were not invited. But I was invited.

Riess: Was it a formal invitation?

Dornin: No, I think Miss Christine Price, who was also a senior cataloger, came and asked me if I wouldn't like to join. But at the time I was supporting my mother, taking care of her, and keeping house, and joining a club was too much. So I said, "No." I didn't join the club until 1947, after my mother's death. As long as she lived, I had her to take care of, so I didn't feel I could go into a club and do club work.

2) Life Inside the Women's Faculty Club

Riess: What would club work be?

Dornin: They would ask you to be on committees, and when they had parties they would expect you to attend. You'd have to take part in the club activities.

Riess: The members were all involved?

Dornin: They had to be, to keep it going. They only had sixty-six members to begin with, and that's not enough to keep a club going unless they're all helping out some way or other with more than just dues.

Dornin: Of course, when they built the building they had the two floors for living quarters. Then they began taking in some other people from outside, people who came from other institutions on sabbatical leaves, for instance. But in the beginning they must have all had to help out, one way or another.

Very shortly after I returned to Berkeley, in the summer of 1926, the Department of Librarianship was advanced to graduate status and became the School of Librarianship in the Graduate Division, with Mr. Mitchell as dean of the school. While I don't remember being conscious of this, Mr. Mitchell must have been working half-time as head of the order department in the University Library and half-time as the chairman of the Department of Librarianship, for he now resigned from the library staff. We gave him a farewell party which was held in the Women's Faculty Club.

It was a joint dinner for Mr. Mitchell and Miss Pauline Gunthorp who was retiring as head of the catalog department. I can remember getting ready for that, because after all those years of lettering on the back of books and things, I could print quite nicely, so I printed all the place cards for the party. It was a big party, and filled all the main dining room. I don't know where the residents went! [laughs] But that's about the first time I can really remember going inside the club.

Riess: When you felt free to join the club, did you immediately apply for residence?

Dornin: Well, this was an accident, as so many of things in my life seem to be. Miss Price was wanting to take three months leave and go to Europe, and she wanted to sublet her room in the club. (She was one of the few that went there to live.) So she came to me. She had a very nice room very nicely furnished. She said, "I think you would take care of my things, because I see that you take care of your own things." She knew that my mother had died, just the end of January, and she asked if I wanted to sublet her room for March, April, and May. This was ideal for me.

The next day I went to see Mr. Donald Coney, who had succeeded Mr. Leupp as head librarian, to ask if I could transfer my month's summer vacation time to February, in order to clear the rented house in which my mother and I had lived. Then I went across campus to the Women's Faculty Club to meet the manager, whose name I have forgotten, although I can remember what she looked like, and to leave an application for membership. (My membership card is dated Feb. 25, 1947 and is signed by Emily G. Palmer, secretary). All went well. I moved out of my former home and into the Women's Faculty Club on the last day of February 1947, little thinking I would remain there just three months short of twenty-five years.

Dornin: I already knew several of the residents in addition to Miss Price-- Miss Ida Secrist, Mrs. Mary B. Davidson, Mrs. Amy B. Bumstead and Miss Katherine R. Wickson. I was cordially welcomed, and very soon I realized I liked the place immensely.

Riess: Mrs. Davidson was there.

Dornin: Yes, she had been assistant dean of women from 1911 on, but she didn't live in the club in the early days.

Riess: What was she like?

Dornin: She had her way. Things that we did that she didn't like, she told us so. Miss Stebbins went out in 1936 as dean of women, so Mrs. Davidson had been dean of women for ten years in 1946. So, you see, the power was there. Oh, you always had to think what Mrs. Davidson would like!

Now, for instance, the cat came there after I had been there a while, Hepzibah. Well, I love cats, and she was obviously very pregnant, and very young, not even a year old, I think. Poor thing had no home. My heart just went out to her, and two or three of the other women, same way. So we began feeding Hepzibah.

Then, it turned out that Mrs. Davidson liked horses and dogs, but she disliked cats, so she wasn't going to have Hepzibah around. I said, "If we keep her outdoors can't we have her?"

"Well, how are you going to keep her outdoors?"

"We just won't let her in the house. We'll feed her outdoors." We had a garden tool room in the basement, under the side porch, and I said, "Couldn't she stay there? I'll make a bed for her in the garden room" Well, Mrs. Davidson gave in. But that was one incident. We always consulted Mrs. Davidson before we made any changes in any rules or regulations or anything.

Riess: Did you meet and make decisions as a group?

Dornin: Not formally. We talked things over among ourselves. After dinner we'd go in the living room and sit there and talk. It would be always on the spur of the moment. But every decision went through the Board of Directors. We residents would submit something to the Board of Directors that we'd like to see changed or that we'd like to add.

Riess: But you would act as a group, rather than individuals?

Dornin: Not formally, in the sense of putting up a notice calling a meeting, but casually after dinner. While we all ate dinner about the same time, we didn't all eat at the same table. We did have a Family Table. You've heard about that. They still have it. But there were all sorts of groupings about the room, even some women who perhaps had some reading to finish before an evening seminar and wanted to sit alone.

The Family Table was intended for the residents who liked to sit together in a friendly group. The seats were usually filled, but not always by the same people, for outside members were welcome, if there was room when they came in. It was a case of "First come, first seated."

In conversations matters might come up about the club house, and here is where there would be a division of interest. Naturally, the outside members and the temporary members would not be as interested in household matters as the permanent members, so instead of boring them, one of us would speak up, "Oh, let's talk about that after dinner."

Riess: And the women who were not residents?

Dornin: They would not stay. They would go to their homes, or very often they might have a meeting on the campus. That would be one of the reasons they had come to dinner.

Riess: Was there any effort made to have at least one resident a member of the board?

Dornin: I don't think it was deliberately done. It very often happened.

Riess: I love the Hepzibah story. Were there ever any other contretemps like that?

Dornin: She lived there sixteen years, and we let her have three sets of kittens, we gave her a chance to know what motherhood was like. [laughs] We didn't have any more animals after her.

Riess: With people living in such close quarters for so long--were there problems of noise, odd habits, smoking?

Dornin: I don't remember anything of that sort when I first went there. All the women had been there for quite a while and such problems had been settled.

When I first went there, it was the ideal solution for me. I had looked for apartments in Berkeley, but it was awfully hard to find a place to live just then for it was right after World War II and all the GI's were coming back--the town was swarming with them.

Dornin: So I went to the manager after I knew I liked the club, and asked if there would be a chance to come in as a regular resident after Miss Price came back in June. It seemed there was one resident who was finishing a sabbatical leave from another university, but she would not be leaving until the end of July. There was one small room which had windows only to the north and was generally used as a guest room. The manager thought I might be allowed to use that for the month of July, if the Board of Directors accepted me as a full time resident. Then, I could move in the bigger room in August. By this time, other members of the club had met me, and I guess I fitted in. If the board had anyone on a waiting list--I don't know, for I was accepted.

I had the room over Mrs. Davidson's, the northwest corner, with a view of Strawberry Creek and the men's club, and the garden. It was a very nice room, a single, and I shared a bath with Agnes McLellan, who was in the Department of Home Economics. We got along perfectly all right, only Agnes would go home in the summer and so I always had these strangers to share with during the summer sessions. Then in the summer of 1950 Christine Price retired and went to live in the Sequoias, Portola Valley. She had a room on the northeast corner, a single with a bath, so I asked for it and I got it.

Riess: Who were your very good friends in the club at that point?

Dornin: My best friend in the club all along was Lucille Czarnowski. She was a teacher of dance in the Physical Education Department for Women. She was a senior supervisor--that was what they were called.

Riess: Do you have any recollections of great highs and lows in food and management over the years?

Dornin: The food, I think, was pretty steady, reasonably good.

Riess: You had lunches and dinners there.

Dornin: Oh, I just lived there, morning, noon, and night.

Riess: New managers must have influenced some sorts of change in cuisine.

Dornin: Well, I'm not hard to please when it comes to food. To me it was good.

The only thing I can remember with managers was when we got the [Gaston] Abbos. Then it was a little troublesome, because that was the first time we'd ever had a man living in the club. We had a student houseboy down in the basement, but he came and went through his own door. But Mr. Abbo, and Mrs. Abbo, took two rooms and made them into an apartment. And Abbo was around the place all the time, and he was a Frenchman [laughs]. We had a little trouble getting used to Mr. Abbo.

Riess: As residents were you aware of the financial chaos under the Abbo regime?

Dornin: Yes, but I was on the board then, so I knew what was going on. I think if I had been just living there--well, I don't know. Of course those things spread around the house, and it was talked about, but I don't think I would have worried about it.

Riess: Getting back to the residents. I asked you about noise and so on? Smoking? Drinking?

Dornin: Well, considering there were twenty-four residents in the house, all busy people, coming and going their various ways, I would say it was remarkably peaceful. However, it was a wooden building and when it was put up, perhaps there were not funds for the extras, such as sound proofing, for the walls and floors could have been thicker. I lived in two different rooms on the third floor at opposite ends of the building. In each case, the woman underneath me was quiet in her movements. However, I knew when she had company, or was talking on the phone. I couldn't understand the words, but the sound of voices was audible. The same with the radio. I think all the women were conscious of this, and tried to be considerate of each other, not talking loudly in the halls, or turning a radio up to a high pitch.

It was outside that there was chaos! For between the late 1940s and the late 1960s, the university was catching up on a building program that had been postponed during the decade of the Great Depression of the 1930s, and the five years of World War II immediately following. All around the northern, eastern, and southern sides of the campus there was steel and concrete construction going on, but it was worst in the central campus, by the two faculty clubs, for there the original buildings had to be demolished to make room for the bigger, new buildings, and some of those had been very solidly built of brick, and were hard to knock down.

There were no problems with smoking that I can remember. While a number of the residents did smoke, they were considerate of those who did not, and when they were in the building confined it to their rooms. While I was there, although there were no signs posted, there was no smoking in the public rooms of the first floor.

As to drinking--for the first few years I was there, if any of the residents did like a cocktail, or a glass of sherry before dinner, she was very discreet about it, for I never knew who she was. Certainly, I never saw alcohol on the tables in the main dining room, or served in the lounge. But somewhere along in the mid-1950s, the attitude toward wine at meals began to change. It may have been due to the influx of university people from western Europe to whom wine was as customary a beverage at dinner as Dornin: water was to an American. Exactly when it first began, or who started it, I have forgotten. But once started, it gradually spread, and by the end of that decade, it was no longer unusual. However, all the years I was there, I don't think the club itself bought and served wine, or any other alcoholic drink. Those who wanted it, bought it, brought it in, served and took away the empties. This was to keep temptation away from the student help in the kitchen and dining room, so I understood.

Riess: In general people worked well together?

Dornin: Yes, very. Of course, in the daytime we were all away, all working.

Riess: Did people keep track of each other? For instance, what if someone had been absent at breakfast?

Dornin: Oh yes, if you didn't come to breakfast, somebody would come looking for you, either one of your best friends, or the manager. In fact, the first day I was there the manager came upstairs to take me down to breakfast to introduce me at the breakfast table. A new member was always introduced.

3) Committee Work

Riess: You were a member of the club's library committee. What did you do?

Dornin: Yes, and it's funny, I can't seem to remember buying any books for that library, at all! But people gave us books, the members of the club, and people outside, not residents, but faculty members. I remember Miss [Hope] Gladding, for instance, was always giving us books. Part of the work of the library committee was to keep the books in order. So once a week or so I'd "read the shelves" to see that everything was in place. We didn't have rules about times [of borrowing] so they kept them out as long as they pleased, which could be unfortunate. So we would write the borrower a note asking her to please bring it back because so-and-so would like to read it.

Riess: And you were on the house committee.

Dornin: That was a committee to see that the rules of the house are observed, to see that people got along, if there are quarrels [laughs]. Or if there was some question about a leak in the roof, the house committee would take that in hand, you see, tell the manager to get a plumber.

Riess: You were on a committee in 1958 to consider some question of length of residence. What was the issue there?

Dornin: What came up in 1958? We had one dear, elderly woman, Miss Sarah Davis, who had been in the Physical Education Department for Women. She was in her eighties, and I think we were getting worried about her. See, we didn't have any medical service or anything like that. We were right across the street from Cowell Hospital, but we didn't have any connection with Cowell. I think it may have been a matter of should we allow people to stay in the club past the time of retirement, because there had been several women up to that time who did stay well past the time of retirement.

That's one of the reasons I got out myself when I did, because I just had that feeling of the writing on the wall, so to speak: "I wish Miss Dornin would hurry up and leave, so we don't have to ask her to."

Riess: What year was that?

Dornin: In October 1971.

Riess: A lot of things were happening in those years.

Dornin: This was when they were beginning to talk about letting men in the club, which I didn't like. I wasn't against men coming there for dinner, but I didn't want them living in the club.

Riess: In February 1971 you were on a committee to consider having a center for continuing opportunities for women [located] in the Women's Faculty Club.

Dornin: Oh, they were to have an office, yes. Yes, but to have that coming and going--all that noise!

Riess: Your committee approved it.

Dornin: Let me see those minutes. [reads] Well, I guess we did, all right. But where could we ever have put them?

There must have been other things besides the handwriting on the wall, besides just the fact that I was getting too old to stay, because I was definitely getting unhappy.

Riess: Would you describe some of the club nights, the parties and dinners?

Dornin: Oh, the annual dinners were great fun, especially as long as Miss Stebbins was the chairman. She was the chairman for a long, long time. We always wore full evening dress to the annual dinners. She would come in, and we'd be sitting there, all of us with our very best clothes, with a new hairdo and everything else, and she would stand up there and look over us all and before she said anything [formal] about welcoming, she would say, "I have never seen such a wonderful-looking group of women." Then she would go on with the business. After she stopped, the later presidents of the club took over, but they never had quite the same spirit that Miss Stebbins had.

Riess: I thought Miss Stebbins was president only until 1941.

Dornin: Yes, but she was chairman of the dinner for quite a while afterward.

Of course, we were all just fixed up to the nth degree. After she stopped being chairman we kept on having evening clothes for a couple of years, and then somebody came in a dress that was to here (midcalf) and well, the formal dressing just went down. Gradually.

Riess: As well as those traditions, you also had holiday traditions in the club, didn't you?

Dornin: Yes, on Easter, Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Year's. Breakfast on these mornings was a festive occasion, prepared and served by the residents themselves in the lounge before a crackling fire.

Card tables were placed together in a square "C" before the fireplace. Dennison paper tablecloths and napkins, with designs appropriate to the season, and lighted candles gave a holiday atmosphere.

We did not attempt a fancy breakfast, but touched up familiar dishes by marinating grapefruit halves in apple cider overnight, and topping each one with a maraschino cherry. Eggs were scrambled with cream, and hot cross buns, or some variety of sweet rolls, warmed in the oven, substituted for toast.

With the maids and kitchen staff on holiday too, we had the place to ourselves, and became an extended family having a whale of a good time. The building usually cleared on the afternoons and evenings of the main holidays, but Christmas Eve and New Year's Eve often found six or eight residents with nowhere to go. About eight o'clock a fire would be started in the lounge fireplace. When it had burned down to hot coals, we would assemble to pop corn (often a pastime new to a foreign resident), drink apple cider, listen to the holiday music on the radio, and talk of Christmas and New Year's traditions in other lands. Off to bed eventually, closer friends, with happy memories to cherish.

4) Special Visitors to the Club

Riess: What about other dinners and special events?

Dornin: Now and again there would be some famous woman come to the campus whom we wanted to entertain. She was lecturing on the campus and we wanted to do something, so we would have a dinner.

Dornin: The woman who wrote Mary Poppins [Pauline Travers] came to the club and stayed with us a few days--about a year or so before I left. She came to the campus because she was giving lectures on folklore. I asked her, so long as she was with us, if one of the nights when she was free from lecturing, she would sit in the living room and talk to us, "Just talk to us, tell us about yourself and what you've done, how you wrote Mary Poppins and so on."

Well, she was a charming woman. We sat round the fireplace. The girls came downstairs. This was no fancy party, we just talked. We asked her questions, and I told her some of the folklore of the campus, which she hadn't heard. She told us how she had become interested in folklore and so on. It was one of the most delightful evenings we had in the whole time I was there! So much better than a formal party.

Riess: Do you recall other interesting visitors?

Dornin: [following material added later] Since I had not traveled widely before coming to the Women's Faculty Club, one of the most attractive things about it to me was the chance to meet women from other parts of the United States and from abroad who were temporary residents. "Temporary" meant anywhere from a six weeks summer session to four years required for a doctorate.

When I first arrived in 1947, these were mostly women in mid-career who needed advanced university training in order to compete for promotion. They were not all in academic fields, however. Some were employed by business corporations and were hopefully climbing the executive ladder. They came from countries that had not been battered by World War II--the United States, Canada and South America.

With the 1950s, the tide seemed to turn more towards university women from western Europe. They were apt to be younger, some still graduate students in their own universities. They had been awarded grants established for research projects, especially in public health and social welfare, and they registered in these two campus schools, both of which seemed to be well known and highly respected worldwide.

From 1960 on, women began to arrive from Southeast Asia, not in the numbers the European women had come, but more than Asian women had previously. We had residents from Cambodia, Thailand, and Malaya, in addition to Japan and Korea. Again, they registered in the School of Public Health, and were supported by grants.

All these women from Europe and Asia were astonishingly proficient in speaking English. It may have been one of the reasons for their being chosen for grants in the first place. It was certainly the main reason for the quick formation of friendships and the lively and interesting conversation around the Family Table.

Dornin: They found the Berkeley campus an exciting place to be during those years, for the university was one of the leaders in developing uses for atomic energy. Hardly a day seemed to pass without the announcement of a new discovery, or a breakthrough in some branch of learning.

They also found California lived up to the brag in genial climate and scenic beauty, but that there were surprises. One of these was the vast distances (to them) Californians drove so matter-of-factly, when they were taken on a weekend outing to Yosemite, Lake Tahoe, or the Mendocino redwoods.

There was the middle-aged professor from the University of Madrid, who was resident during a fall semester when California had a championship football team which won the bid to the Rose Bowl game on New Year's Day. The campus was in a froth of excitement. She could understand this among the students, but why the faculty and staff, adult individuals with a serious purpose in life, seemed to be similarly infected was beyond her. Then she heard us planning on staying overnight in Santa Barbara on the trip to and from the game. Her eyes widened. "How far is this Pasadena from Berkeley?" she asked. Someone shrugged a casual, "Oh, four hundred miles."

"Four hundred miles!" (a pause while she mentally changed miles into meters) "Why, that's the distance from Madrid to Paris, and no one travels from Madrid to Paris and back for a football game!"

Summer sessions brought school teachers by the dozen to Berkeley, mainly from the United States. Nearly always there were nuns from the College of Holy Names in neighboring Oakland, so we were accustomed to the sight of them on the campus.

However, in the summer of 1960, we were not prepared to have one in residence from a convent in Illinois. She was pleasant, although sedate in manner, and at first we were awkward, feeling she expected certain courtesies with which we were not familiar, other than addressing her as "Sister." Probably, she was experienced in adjusting to the outside world, for she went her way quietly and we went ours. We became used to the swish of her long skirts in the halls, and the sight of the black habit and stiff, white coif at the dining table, but we were never quite at ease with her.

She must have found us agreeable, however, for the next summer she was back with a companion. This one was short, plump, and pretty, with a bright smile and a twinkle in her eye. She was a teacher in a parochial high school for boys in New Jersey, and had registered for a class in the elements of atomic energy, of all things. When she told us at the end of the first day that she was the only woman in the class, we wondered how she would get along. Would the men shy away from her black habit, and leave her to solve Dornin: problem sets on her own? We needn't have worried. The grapevine in due time informed us that she was the delight of the faculty, she had an excellent mathematical mind and was one of the best students in the class. Her quick wit kept them all chuckling. She kept us chuckling too, and that summer slid by all too quickly.

So, when the third summer brought us five nuns, the original two, and three more from the Midwest, we took it in stride. But this time, we were the ones to be surprised. There had been a change of thought at the Vatican during the year. Only one of the nuns wore the classic habit. The others were in greatly modified habits that resembled the Quaker dress, or that of early New England Puritans. In their relief from the weight of yards of heavy serge, and the confinement of the starched coif that permitted them to see only straight ahead, they acted almost like girls.

Not that they forgot their religious duties. I would be nearly ready to go down to breakfast and would glance out my north window to see them returning from early mass at the Newman Club, the student Catholic chapel, which was then located north of the campus.

In those days, there was a small statue of St. Francis of Assisi in the back garden. His cupped, outstretched hand made a drinking fountain for the birds. The nun still in the old-time habit asked me if I would take a picture of her beside the statue. She was a tall, heavy-set woman, and St. Francis was dwarfed beside her, but we went ahead. The picture proved to be a good portrait and her mother, to whom the picture was sent, was pleased. But I wondered if the nun, in her letters home, had not been too enthusiastic about this club in which she was spending the summer in the Wild West and the mother needed reassurance her daughter was still within saintly influences.

By the time the summer of 1963 rolled around, college campuses were beginning to simmer with what was to become the infamous Free Speech Movement. One disturbance after another continued all through the remainder of the 1960s and our religious residents were seen no more.

Riess: As residents, when there was someone new, who was out here for a few months for research or something, did you reach out and draw that person in?

Dornin: Well, the atmosphere of the club was--the minute they got there, the first dinner they had with us, or the first breakfast, why they were friends. We went and talked in their rooms; they came to our rooms.

Dornin: There was only one person that we ever had with whom we really had trouble, a poor overweight soul who wanted to study for a Ph.D. in biology. This woman, the first thing she did when she moved in was to fill the service refrigerator on her floor with food. She was eating all the time, a compulsive eater! She was unpleasant about everything. When she didn't make her grades to get her Ph.D. candidacy, everyone was "agin" her.

She had a room that didn't have a large enough easy chair, so I went downtown to try and buy a larger chair. I got her an over-stuffed chair. But it rocked, and she didn't like that. I also got a cover for her bed, to replace one she didn't like, and she didn't like it either!

5) Friends and Residents

Riess: Who comes to mind instantly in your happy memories of the club?

Dornin: Well, of course Margaret Murdock. She did everything she could possibly do for the club. After her retirement, she worked in the office; she did things outside to help out the club, such as fundraising. She lived there for a while. I think she would have stayed there, except she liked to play the piano, and she always played it on Saturday afternoon. Well, this may have been a point of dissension during a period before I came, because she used to play, and some woman, perhaps somebody above her--because the piano was in the main room where it is now--this person complained that every Saturday afternoon was "full of Bach."

Riess: So, you think of Margaret Murdock.

Dornin: She comes first. Then the other is "Smitty" [Josephine Smith].

Riess: People actually called her "Smitty?"

Dornin: We always called her "Smitty," never Josephine. Everybody did. And the woman she lived with was "Albro" [Mary Albro]. Never called them by their first names. "Smitty and Albro." In fact, I addressed Christmas cards to "Smitty and Albro, Inc." She was another one of the women's advocates [means, advocate of keeping the club for women only]. When the club needed a bookkeeper, Smitty was right there. It was her field, you see, in the university. She knew all about budgeting. She was President Sproul's budget clerk.

Riess: Are there any others that you think of?

Dornin: Marian Moore. She worked over in Cowell Hospital with the students, social worker I think is what they called her. She did beautiful sewing, and she would make us curtains; if our curtains began to wear out, she would make us a whole new set of curtains for the living room. She was always doing something of that sort.

Really, there were dozens who were especially interesting. Let me mention some as examples or types of what kind of people we had, rather than as better than others. I hope people who read this history will understand what I mean.

For instance, we had Miss Madi Bacon, who came from Vienna where everyone seems to be born talented in music. Madi became interested in helping the San Francisco Opera Company in training a few young boys to sing in the two or three operas which contained parts for young voices. They did so well that before it seemed possible Madi was the founder, director and conductor of the San Francisco Boys Chorus, now one of the city's treasured institutions.

Miss Chiyoko Tokunaga from Japan came to Berkeley to study genetics. She remained on the campus to become a research associate under Kurt Stern in the University's Virus Laboratory. She bought a home in north Berkeley and continues to serve the University as an interpreter and campus escort for distinguished Japanese visitors.

Dr. Ruth Stewart, a native of upstate New York and a trained nurse, who had spent several years as a Methodist medical missionary in Korea, lived at the club when she was at Berkeley to study for a Ph.D. in public health. Upon receiving her degree, she returned to Korea as an associate professor in the Department of Preventive Medicine and Public Health at Yonsei University. She has also become noted as the author of two books of short stories which reflect the resilience of the Korean people under all sorts of conditions.

Another illustrious resident was the Honorable Elsa Mois, a lawyer from Denmark, who spent some time at Berkeley's Boalt Hall of Law. A year after she returned to Denmark, we received word she had been appointed to a judgeship.

Riess: The name Mary Floyd Williams came up in a letter in 1946 about whether or not to floodlight the club for protection of residents coming home at night.

Dornin: Miss Mary Floyd Williams, now she was a character! She was here when I came. She wrote books. She wrote A Book, I should say! (Fortune, Smile Once More, a story about early San Francisco) Mary Floyd I think was one of the women who they brought in from the Town and Gown Club very early--because they needed more members.

- Dornin: I knew Mary Floyd! She was writing this book, and she had a room over the garden and you'd hear her typewriter going. You'd hear "tap tap tap tap tap" and you'd look up and see Mary Floyd working away. She was an elderly woman by the time I got there, maybe in her middle-eighties. She hadn't been away from the club too long when she died, at ninety-something.
- Riess: Another resident in 1946 was Miss Agnes McLellan.
- Dornin: Yes, as I have said, she was my bathroom mate in the beginning. She was in home economics, She was very nice, a sweet girl, but not a lively one. We lost her in 1953, when most of the College of Agriculture departments, including her field, home economics, were moved to the Davis campus.
- Riess: Miss Edith Pickard.
- Dornin: Yes, she was a teacher over at San Francisco State. She was a regular member, but she commuted back and forth to San Francisco, until the college moved way out to Stonestown. She was trying to get a Ph.D. in zoology; that's how she got into the club in the beginning, as a Ph.D. student. She was trying very hard to get this Ph.D. with Professor [Charles A.] Kofoed. Well, he died just after she completed her thesis and none of the other professors felt he knew enough about the particular fish she was writing about for her thesis, and none of them would take her on, so she never got her Ph.D. I think it was one of the meanest things that the faculty did. They could have accepted what she had done; even if they didn't know every little tiny thing about that fish, they must have known enough about fishes in general to know whether she was doing a good piece of work or not. And certainly Kofoed wouldn't have taken her on as a Ph.D. student if she wasn't a fine student! Well, that's where your macho comes in again; a man student would have been helped somehow to get that degree.
- Riess: It must have been interesting to have that mix of students with the residents.
- Dornin: It was, because you learned a lot about what it meant to drudge through a Ph.D. They had very little social life.
- Riess: Was there a curfew for the club?
- Dornin: No, we all had keys. But there was a woman professor who came from England one summer who came in at two o'clock in the morning. [laughs] She came from one of the women's universities connected with Oxford. She was well known in her field and she was taken out by the entire group of the younger English professors, and I think they had taken her over to North Beach and gone from one place to another, and she was so drunk! It was terrible.

Dornin: We heard her coming home. An automobile drove up, and we heard ~~her~~ getting out of the car. "I can walk myself." Then the men trying to persuade her to let them help her in the house. Finally she ~~got~~ in the house, and then she had to come up two flights of stairs. We could hear her coming up the stairs, thump, thump, thump. Staggering down the hall. And then into her room, bang!

Well, of course everyone was scared to go in, but what if ~~she~~ had hurt herself, or hit her head on the table, or something. So we went downstairs to the office, got the master key, and peeked in, and she was lying flat on the floor. Oh, my gosh! That was one of the meanest tricks they could have done, a decent woman, to take ~~her~~ and do something like that. Probably one drink was enough.

She was a very interesting woman, but eccentric in her appearance, which was probably what led the men on.

Riess: Did she come down to breakfast the next day?

Dornin: No, and the maid didn't know anything about it and went up to ~~clean~~ her room in the middle of the morning and she was still lying ~~there~~. [laughs] It was awfully funny, but at the same time it was kind of shocking that the faculty would be so mean to do a thing like ~~that~~.

Riess: We have just a minute more. Anyone else come to mind in your memories of the club?

Dornin: Mrs. Amy Bumstead. After Mr. Mitchell became the dean of the Library School in 1926, Mr. Frank M. Bumstead became the head of the order department. About fifteen years later, he died of tuberculosis, which was unfortunate. It was a very, very happy marriage. After he died, she [Amy Bumstead] began working for the ASUC, and she came to live at the Women's Faculty Club.

She was a darling, a dear little woman, a little bit of a ~~thing~~. Her brother was Professor Harold Bruce of the English Department. She was just all heart, would do anything for anybody. She had a car, and I didn't, so anytime I wanted to go anywhere, she'd drive. In fact, she drove me on one trip way up into Canada. Because ~~she~~ was so kind, other people naturally reflected that. You felt, goodness, she's so nice, I've got to be, I can't be unpleasant in the face of this wonderful woman, which she was. The early 1950s, when they were building Carmel Valley Manor, was the time that she decided it was time that she left [the Women's Faculty Club].

6) Early Surroundings of the Women's Faculty Club

[added later by Miss Dornin]

Dornin: I got to thinking of how crowded the area about the Women's Faculty Club is now, and how open it used to be, and I thought you might be interested to know that the club had a street number once. When the Women's Faculty Club was built in 1923, it was assigned the address "2200 College Avenue," although its main entrance faced south on Sylvan Way.

Current maps of the city of Berkeley showed a road entering the northeastern part of the University of California campus from its boundary street, Hearst Avenue at La Loma Avenue. The road passed Founders' Rock, and descended steeply past the Hearst Mining Building and the original Chemistry Building to cross the campus bridge at Strawberry Creek and meet the first block of College Avenue, the southern boundary of the campus.

The first block of College Avenue extended south to Bancroft Way. Here, the street made a twenty-foot jog to the west and continued south in a straight line to the Berkeley-Oakland line.

Since Berkeley's numbering system for north-south streets begins at the city's north boundary and proceeds southward, the number "2200" indicated College Avenue began in the center of the city.

Sylvan Way was a narrow road which ran west from College Avenue along side the original southern boundary of the campus to meet Telegraph Avenue where it began at Sather Gate.

For some years, the University had been gradually purchasing the land between its southern boundary and Bancroft Way and west of College Avenue. When the Women's Faculty Club was built, the university already owned all of the west side of the first block of College Avenue. Across Sylvan Way, at 2220 College Avenue, was the students' infirmary, a former private residence remodeled and enlarged for this use.

Beyond the infirmary lay the women's playing field and swimming pool, both under the jurisdiction of the Department of Physical Education for Women. The playing field was surrounded by a high, board fence; the swimming pool was indoors in an annex to Hearst Hall, the original gymnasium for women.

Beautiful Hearst Hall, designed by Bernard Maybeck, one of Berkeley's most famous architects, had been burned to the ground, presumably by an arsonist, in the spring of 1922. It's burned-out foundations were still evident.

Dornin: The corner block of land extending down Bancroft Way a couple of hundred feet was occupied by the university tennis courts. The east side of the block was still private property, occupied by family homes and a fraternity house. The street still belonged to the City of Berkeley.

On September 17, 1923, a third of Berkeley, north of the university campus and east of Shattuck Avenue, was devastated by a raging fire, driven by a fierce north-east wind. As this part of the city was rebuilt, and a considerable number of apartment houses replaced single family homes, the traffic along College Avenue and across the upper campus road increased steadily until it became a noisy throughfare.

To the residents of the Women's Faculty Club, once secure in their peaceful dell, this was a catastrophe. Miss Christine Price, of the university library staff, would come to work complaining bitterly of her loss of sleep due to the shifting into low gear, particularly by trucks as they crossed the Strawberry Creek bridge and began the long grind up the steep slope to Founders' Rock.

There were no funds for new road construction during the Depression years of 1930, and those of World War II that followed immediately. It was not until 1946 that money became available, and the campus road was realigned to the left as it passed Founders' Rock, and contoured on a much easier grade directly below the Greek Theatre, and around the Big Chill to meet the first block of Piedmont Avenue, the street east and above College Avenue. Named Gayley Road for a former, famous campus professor of English literature, it became the permanent access road across the upper campus, and peace returned to the Women's Faculty Club. The old road was torn up, and the terrain it occupied was bulldozed into sites for new science and engineering buildings.

Meanwhile, changes had been taking place on the first block of College Avenue. William Randolph Hearst, son of Mrs. Pheobe A. Hearst, had given the University funds for a new gymnasium for women, in memory of his mother. A site for this was chosen on Bancroft Way, opposite Bowditch Street, and it was completed in 1927.

The old swimming pool and athletic field which had been in use by the women students ever since Hearst Hall had burned, were abandoned and unused for several years. In 1934, they were converted into a laboratory for research in erosion and tidal problems of beaches, harbors and rivers. This was called the Hydraulic Model Basin.

Dornin: In 1930, through a bequest from the estate from Ernest V. Cowell, class of 1880, matched with a state bond issue, the University had been enabled to purchase land on the east side of College Avenue and erect the southern half of Cowell Memorial Hospital. On its completion, the students' infirmary was razed, and a much needed concrete building, called for want of a better name the Temporary Classroom Building (now Minor Hall), was built.

One by one, the pioneer Berkeley homes on the east side of the block had become vacant as their owners passed away, and the property had either been bequeathed to, or purchased by the University. The houses were used as quarters for a spate of "institutes, centers, and bureaus" which sprang up following World War II.

The street itself remained unchanged, and open to traffic within the campus until the late 1950s and 1960s, when the campus massive building program brought plans for Wurster Hall and Calvin Hall, which effectively closed it off. Today, all that remains of the 2200 block of College Avenue is the rectangular parking space bordered by Cowell Hospital, Calvin Hall, Wurster Hall, Minor Hall, and the Women's Faculty Club, while Sylvan Way is only a name on an old-time map.

1) The Forties--English Department, and the Women's Faculty Club

Riess: Before you joined the Women's Faculty Club, what did you think of it?

Miles: I never heard of it.

Riess: What did you think of women faculty, in fact?

Miles: Not very much. I guess, probably, that is a good place to start.

When I came to Berkeley in 1934, I had good friends who had come up here to do graduate work. I hadn't intended to do graduate work. There were women professors at UCLA, all of whom encouraged me not to do graduate work; they said I was too poetic a type, and not scholarly enough. So, the support I got was from men, and from the men who were my colleagues at UCLA, students who came up to Berkeley.

Then I had some operations that did not work out. I was kind of forlorn, and my friends said, "Well, come up and get your M.A. at Berkeley. Maybe you could get a job doing research or something like that."

All in the thirties, I never heard of the Women's Faculty Club. I didn't know it existed. I could have, but did not get any help from women in that time, like women deans or what have you. There were no women in the English Department at all. The English Department was extremely nice to me. As you know, in 1940 they asked me if I would like to try to teach. I was very admiring of about half of the men in the department. I was very loyal to them. So I still paid no attention to anything which made me think of the Women's Faculty Club.

Riess: When you say that you did not get any help from women deans, had you sought help from women deans?

Miles: To some degree, yes, in little things, like parking stickers and so on. The women, as I remember them in terms of officialdom, were rather militant, rigorous--not very bending. I provided a lot of exceptions that they did not want to have to face. It was so wonderful that the men in the English Department were not like that. They let nothing stop them when they decided I should try to teach here. Then they did all of these things for me so that I could try.

Oh, it must have been about four years later--I began teaching here in 1940--maybe three or four years later, there was a very nice woman across the hall from me in Wheeler. Her name was Pauline Sperry. She was a professor in mathematics. She would drop by to say hello and ask me about my work. She became, really literally, the first woman professional of any kind that had ever paid me a good word. (Oh, Hildegard Flanner, the poet, I should say, is another one. She lived still down in Altadena at that time.)

Pauline was a little waspy creature, very brisk and militantly anti-male. She kept telling me that I should join the Women's Faculty Club, of which she was an officer.

I said, "No way, too many steps, too hard to get into. Besides, I do not know why anybody would want to belong to a women's faculty club."

Riess: Did you and she actually have discussions of male-female issues?

Miles: No, no.

Riess: When you say militantly anti-male, how?

Miles: She would barge up and down the hall saying, "Damn Professor So-and-So!" I would listen and laugh, that is all.

Then, we had a new chairman in the English Department, rather inexperienced. He decided he would make things friendly. (The English Department had been rather unorganized for quite a while, which I did not know. To me, they seemed very nice.) The chairman's name was Jim Cline. He said, "Well, let us have our meeting at the Men's Faculty Club."*

As fate would have it, I was still in my office, ready to go up there, and they asked me if I would carry the minutes up. So, I carried the minutes and my helper carried me. Two other women who were visiting went along. We had no permanent staff, nor was I. We were all just visiting lecturers. We went up there, and they would not let us in. I guess that begins my interest in the Women's Faculty Club.

*The Faculty Club.

Riess: The men in the English Department had been just totally blind to that possibility?

Miles: Yes, they had. They were very nice men, they just were not like that. They did not belong to the Men's Faculty Club. There were, you see, militants on both sides. I think that there were a number of gays in the English Department. They paid no attention to the Men's Faculty Club either. I mean, they had another little world of their own. I did not bother them, and they did not bother me.

The macho men in the Men's Faculty Club, they later explained we could not come in because we would have to pass a room in which they would be wearing tee shirts, or underwear, BVD's, or whatever it was in those days.

Riess: But usually the English Department faculty did not go up to The Faculty Club.

Miles: No, no. They were very surprised. I just gave them the minutes and went home. They phoned me later and said, "Oh, what a shame, blah, blah, blah, We will not try that again, and so on." I did tell this to Pauline Sperry, so that ignited the flames.

Riess: Did it ignite flames in you? Or was it just amusing?

Miles: No, it was amusing. Oh, I was a little angry, but not much. I mean, you know, I knew lots of men. Lots of men professors were like that too. So were a lot of my friends.

Let us put it this way, I still do not see why men should not be able to get together if they want to without women--if they just had made it a little clearer. As it turned out, they would not let any women in that club except in one room. They were very chilling about it. That is why the women had to build a club. It was really forced on them. I had not realized that before.

Then Pauline said, "Well, now you see you owe it to women to join, even if you never come."

I said, "Okay. Tell me the dues, and I will give you the check, but I am never coming." Not out of any principles, just that it was physically hard.

2) The Dinner Club

Miles: Then she said, "We have this dinner club once a month in which we pick people to give research papers, different women. There are about twelve women and each one gives a research paper during the year. Would you like to come to that?"

"Oh, great," I said, "I would love to come to that." So they invited me. That was some of the most interesting stuff I have ever, ever done.

Riess: That was a club within the club?

Miles: It was right here in this room. Yes, it was just a dinner club.

Riess: It was not open to just everyone in the Women's Faculty Club?

Miles: Well, it might have been. I do not even know. They invited me. I do not know whether they would have invited others. I do not know how they were comprised. You see, I did not ask many questions, actually.

Riess: Did they have a name?

Miles: No.

I remember the first paper I heard was on the Anopheles mosquito by some scientist, biologist. I went home and I told my family, "This is where it is at, this Anopheles mosquito, the way you can learn enough to know all [there is] about the Anopheles mosquito." This is the first time I ever really got interested in research and the whole of science. I had done it as a graduate student, but it was all related to poetry, it related to my subject matter.

Riess: Poetry is so open ended.

Miles: That is right. It did not have this research aspect. Just to show you how nice the men in the department were, J.S.P. Tatlock, who was a rigorous bibliographer, and who felt that I should earn my living working in encyclopedias at the Huntington--which was a good practical idea--when I said that I did not want to work on the medieval Latin dictionary, which was his baby, he walked up a steep hill to my house bringing me all the medieval Latin stuff that he had found in the Rolls Series that dealt with poetry.

Now, I think that is really creative scholarship! But it only partly got to me. I knew he was kind, and I laughed about it and I did it. But it was hearing these women talk about their research and how exciting it was that really set off the firecrackers.

Riess: What other women can you remember in that group?

Miles: Oh, I am embarrassed to say that is the only one I can remember. There was a doctor by the name of Joy Bishop--I think that was her name. She did a paper on something to do with doctoring. There were three or four women from nutritional sciences. I just cannot remember their names. Ruth Okey was one. They are now up at Davis, if they have not retired. There was Alice Tabor in German. That was the only arts one, or languages one. Everybody else was science. I think Pauline Sperry, the mathematician, was quite a leading factor in all this. Oh, yes, there was the famous Emily Huntington, the economist. She was, of course, their social leader. Pauline was just more of a little intellectual gadfly.

Riess: The reason there were not more from the arts or the humanities is just because there were not any anyway?

Miles: There weren't any. Yes, that is part of it.

3) Academic Women

Miles: As I probably have explained in other talks at other times, in 1920, when World War I was over, there was a great openness to women professors. Women had been going to get Ph.D.'s while the men were overseas. So here are these women Ph.D.'s, all being gung-ho to be scholars. This is the time of the great Margaret Mead, the great Ruth Benedict, Martha Beckwith--probably other fields too, but I happened to meet those anthropology women because they sort of congregated out here.

They scattered through the countryside getting jobs. It was very much, in a way, like my getting a job in 1940 because there was another war coming along. Then most of those women were advanced, as I was too, eventually. So, they became a solid force but a dated one. Let me say, unfortunately, they did not recruit women. They themselves enjoyed being, I think, rather singular.

Riess: But they never felt themselves as underdogs in any way.

Miles: Well, I am not sure, because I did not talk to them about it. I think they felt embattled. I cannot explain it, I was just so loyal to my own colleagues. I felt they were embattled; I knew that they had fascinating backgrounds. But I mean, I did not ask them for their histories around here, whether they had felt hurt or demeaned.

Miles: All of this came to me later when I just had to join women's caucuses because it was so clear that women were being unfairly treated. That was very, very hard for me to accept. I just did not want to hear about that, because I did not want to hear that some of these men were pulling these fast ones.

You know, I think it was at one time in the 1960s that twenty lecturers in the sciences were dismissed, but were told they could reapply in the regular channels. (They had just been appointed as lecturers.) When they applied to regular channels with all their credentials and all their work and all their research, there was always one clear negative voice to say "No." So, we did not have a chance.

I saw a movie called "Zoot Suit" last night. It was very much like the trial in "Zoot Suit." That is another point.

Riess: You have stated that men in your experience had been very supportive, and women very non-supportive.

Miles: Also, this is what I found later to be the sad part, I was not untypical; the women who were supported by the men did not want to go ahead and support other women. I do not blame myself too much because I did go out and work hard on the other side. We all gave ourselves the impression that it was because we were so good that the men supported us. You see, it was all self-flattery.

Now, for example, I do not think this is fair or true, but one of the deans of women told me once--whichever one it was I forget, one of the ones around here--she said that I had put the cause of women in education at the University back fifty years because my presence did not raise the crucial issues of, you know, femininity and so forth.

Riess: Well, that must have been a new breed of deans of women. Katherine Towle, for instance, where would she stand on this?

Miles: Well, it was not she. She was a WAC, so she was used to these different kinds. It was the one before her. But anyway, their point was, and it turned out to be a true one, though it hurt my feelings at the time, of course, that the role model issue is very important. I did not provide a role model, you see.

Neither did Pauline, neither did most of these women, because they were all exceptional in one way or another. We had no beautiful, urbane, widely-recognized women. Somebody who has somewhat played that role lately is Marian Diamond. Even so, she is such an exception to some degree, that you have to smile when you say it.

Miles: This kind of really top flight--well, look at the trouble Rose Bird is having.* I think she is very attractive and looks like a leader to me.

Riess: What you are talking about is the degree of real femininity, or what?

Miles: Let us see, what would I say? The absence of threat to men was very important. Most of these women that were in this group were no threat to men for one reason or another, but they also just never asked to be in men's groups. That is still fine with me.

Riess: Did they talk about any of these things as they sat around this table?

Miles: No, no, not with me they did not. Lately, of course, in the 1960s we talked about nothing else for ten years, or twenty years.

Okay, so the Women's Faculty Club then, that dinner meeting, those were wonderful. For some reason, I do not remember why, but they died out I guess somewhere at the end of the forties. In the fifties, again, I never heard of the Women's Faculty Club. Pauline was gone. All of these older women were gone.

They kicked the Nutrition Department up to Davis. I was on the committee and they did it in a very illegal fashion. They wanted to get rid of all those women, because it was home ec--but it really was a woman's issue. [Clark] Kerr said they were not good enough for Berkeley. Then he brought in a man nutritionist. Okay, all right, I know. Ruth Okey was a nice homebody, you know. She did her Ph.D. I remember they built a model house over there. Agnes Fay Morgan, by the way, was a real big shot in all this. When Agnes Fay Morgan retired or died, whappo, nothing was left of her empire. They just wiped it out and sent it up to Davis. Even though the committee I was on, everybody supported the keeping of it here, we woke up the next year to find it was gone.

Riess: This is a trend in this university, to remove anything that is practical, home economics, design, drama--and the women tend to teach in those fields.

Miles: In some of those fields, right.

Riess: You have pointed out that 16 percent of the tenured faculty were women back in the 1940s as compared to some 3 percent in the early 1970s.

Miles: Isn't that frightful? Then in the 1950s everything was very dull.

4) The Sixties--Saving the Club

Miles: There was a woman whom you probably know, a real pillar of society around here, by the name of Elizabeth Scott, in statistics. I asked her advice about some statistics once and she was kind of interested in what I was doing. We stayed in touch. She is someone you can stay in touch with in terms of ideas. [Interruption to discuss dessert]

She [Scott] looked me up and she said, "Have you heard about all of the terrible things that are happening at the Women's Faculty Club? Emily Huntington is justly sick of the whole bit and nobody is supporting it anymore. She is doing all of the work and a few of the board members."

Riess: Emily Huntington was "justly sick of the whole bit?"

Miles: Yes, because nobody was doing any work. Mary Lou Norrie, in P.E., was the president. Now, this is all second hand because when these old gals had gone, I didn't know who was around. Apparently the story was that they were going to have a meeting to vote to give the Women's Faculty Club to the university. The university had already agreed that it was going to use it for carrels for the History Department. They could easily and inexpensively make the whole building over into carrels. History deeply needed carrels.

Riess: Everybody was so apathetic that Emily Huntington could by force of her own personal persuasion just--

Miles: Almost, almost.

Riess: What about all of those people who for years have used it as "the club?"

Miles: That is not true during the fifties. It was very sluggish. One of the dangers during the fifties was that there were three or four little old ladies who used the club as home. They lived here and they used it in every way, and they did not pay much. These were honored little old ladies and nobody knew what to do about them. So they ran the club straight down the tube. I am vague because, as I say, I was not involved.

Whenever this was, I can figure it out, when did I write that poem?

Riess: You wrote a poem about it?

Miles: Well, no, I wrote this poem called "Saving the Bay" when Elizabeth Scott called me up. It was probably the early 1960s, I imagine. She said, "Don't you think we ought to fight this? Emily Huntington is tired and Mary Lou Norrie is not a fighter. Nobody else knows what to do. The women faculty members do not and never have joined this thing since the old group. It seems to me that it is important in enough ways that we should try to do something."

We had by that time one tenured woman in the English Department, named Anne Middleton. I called up Anne. I think I had gotten her to join. So Anne and Betty and I went to this meeting as a group of three. Boy, did we sabotage that poor meeting! It turned out the people did not want to kill the club. They came to kill it because the leadership said it was unviable. Nobody had come to--you know, you have a board meeting, nobody comes. You have a membership meeting, nobody comes. You know, that can be pretty awful.

So we spoke up in the other direction and said what might be done. We might get Prytanean's help, we might get this women's center's help. All of these new things were burgeoning on campus with a consciousness of women in the women's lib sense, not in the old scholarly sense. So we mentioned all of these things.

Then we had to vote. The score was something like, well, it was very heavily on our side. Everybody was totally amazed. They said to Elizabeth and Anne and me, "Well, great, you are now the board of directors." None of us bought that. We were not that type. We did not know what to do.

Riess: Did the residents join in on this? I mean, since you were on their side in a way.

Miles: The residents were all about 103 years old. They were just hanging on because they were not paying any money to stay here, or not much. That is my impression. Now again, I have only been told that the club in those years was ruined by the fact that when you came in here you just saw people who were blind, deaf and dumb, and only about seven of them. That is all there was around here. [laughter]

Riess: Oh dear! Of course that was a time in the 1960s when everything was under attack. Maybe this was easily seen as sort of a sacrificial lamb.

Miles: It was, it was. That is right. We were "doing our bit" by the University giving them this space.

Now then, what happened, I do not know, because I really hid out at that point. I did not come back. I think Betty did come back and work. I am not sure about Anne.

Riess: So then, who took over?

Miles: I think maybe Betty did, some of it. You must talk to her.

Anyway, where I pick up again, say that is early sixties, I do not pick up again until maybe ten years later.

Riess: Well, what about Prytanean and the women's center? How important is that in the history?

Miles: Well, that is true, I was--. In the sixties, the English Department women joined together and created what they called the women's caucus, in order to fight for the department to get more women in the department. (Just parenthetically, I will say that they never had to fight again. The department was just great. They always voted for whatever they wanted. So within a few years we had twelve women on the staff, and so on.)

Riess: Actually, I remember this from your oral history. This was a time when you took leadership. People were outraged and hysterical. You said, "Well, let us look at the facts."

Miles: Yes, "Let's take it easy." We did, we took it easy. I was planning to have lunch today with one of those women and then she got called away. So, that is why I have this free hour because we were going to kind of reminisce. Her name is Dorothy Brown, and you might be interested in talking to her too, though this was not related to the club. She was on the women's studies side of it.

Riess: The women's caucus was just for the English Department, right?

Miles: Yes, and then also I mentioned those twenty lecturers in the sciences, and a group of very fine scientific leaders had a kind of underground women's movement to try to help them. We all failed on that one. The cards were really stacked.

What I am trying to say here is that many of the things we then tried were fund-raisers for women. We had them in the Women's Faculty Club. I remember many times during the sixties coming in here to poetry reading or some kind of colloquium, the type of thing that you saw in the "Images of California."* We paid rent for those. For the life of me I cannot remember who the manager was then. I cannot remember what the finances were. We did have wine and cheese and we did pay rent. There always were diapers on the staircases because of the women's center. It became a babysitting center. Nobody liked this very well.

*"Images of California," organized by Jim Hughes, 1978-79, from the Institute of Governmental Studies, was a sequence of sessions with speakers from varied humanities disciplines considering the common theme of how California is perceived.

Riess: The Women's Center now housed in T-9 is such a different group. What was the original women's center all about?

Miles: Well, you see, I did not come to any of those Prytanean meetings.

Riess: It was a child-care service, or what?

Miles: Yes, it became a child-care service. In other words, in my best speculation--but I am not the one to really ask--but in my relation to the Women's Faculty Club in the early sixties, we came to dinners and banquets given by other departments for other reasons--like the Aesthetics Group met here. I do not remember anything about the officers or anything about the finances except that everyone was saying that this cannot go on. "We cannot use the Women's Faculty Club as a babysitting service."

Prytanean, I think, had helped sponsor this, but then was finding it was not working. Everybody was trying to get the T building, which they did. So, when they got the T building, the kids all cleared out and now we were left with not much of anything again.

Riess: Brief tangent: why were you raising funds for women?

Miles: Because they were being eliminated around here.

Riess: You were raising funds to support positions?

Miles: Those twenty lecturers. We had some law cases.

Riess: Funds to fight the legal battle?

Miles: Well, it was not that much money. It was mostly funds to--you know how women are, it was to have cake sales, to give a party, to invite the men so they would come and be friendly, you know, indirect, very indirect.

Riess: You were still looking at it with a somewhat jaundiced eye, even though you were participating in it.

Miles: Yes. I would never have done any of what now comes, which is from the mid-sixties on, if it had not been for these half a dozen or so of these great gals in the English Department who just came to me and said I had to, just the way Pauline Sperry had. These women were not especially scholars. They were women libbers and they wanted rights for women in the English Department and in the university. Since I knew Elizabeth Scott, who supported them statistically on anything they wanted to find out if she knew it was true, all of our suspicions were statistically valid, I had that entr   into something that was important to them.

Riess: They were graduate students?

Miles: They were graduate students. They were just--you know how that accidentally happens--a nice group of friends that worked together. They got what they wanted in the department partly because I encouraged them to be not too crabby about it--partly because we had a very nice committee with men on it as well as women. Okay, so then we used the club a lot, just as a nice resource.

Everybody said how marvelous that this club is there. It is a way of life which is nowhere else on campus. For very little money we can come here and have poetry readings and music recitals and all of these great things, and enjoy friends and just come for a cup of tea. How marvelous! They all gave credit to Anne and Betty and me for this because they had all heard that it had already been turned into carrels.

So this went on for quite a long time. Then, I kept saying, "But the faculty members, you do not join. How do you expect the place to go on without you?" Well, they did not have the time, they have to bring brown bag lunches. This has been our answer all the time. "No, no, no time for clubbishness."

The men's club, by the way, is not flourishing for clubbishness either. It is just not that era. Well, then to go faster ahead--

Riess: The men's club was not flourishing or is not flourishing?

Miles: Is not. It is ten or twenty thousand dollars in debt.

Riess: That is a statement of fact, that people do not have time?

Miles: That is the statement they give you.

Riess: What do you think about that?

Miles: Well, if I were Pauline Sperry I would not take "No" for an answer, but I am not. I think all the women in the English Department should say join. Even Anne Middleton is gone now because she has too much else to do. [She's back!]

Riess: You would also say that all the women in the English Department are overworked?

Miles: Yes, that is true, they are.

Riess: But they should join to support it?

Miles: It is only three dollars a month.

5) The Seventies--Merger Meetings and Other Meetings

Miles: Somewhere around the early seventies, I get this phone call from Peg Uridge, who was head of the circulation or something at the library. All I knew about Peg Uridge is that I used to talk to her on the phone about books sometimes. One time I was having dinner at a Chinese restaurant and she recommended the pickles. In other words, my only memory of what she looks like was those pickles.

I got this phone call saying, "Will you be on the board of the Women's Faculty Club, because we are in terrible trouble and I don't know how to handle it." She was a dominant administrator on the whole campus--so she jolly well should. She said, "Roger Heyns persuaded one of the angels of Berkeley," one of the big whatever--[Strauss Associates].

Riess: The Haases.

Miles: Yes, "to donate money to refurbish both clubs, make them both fire proof and so on, in exchange for the fact that they would become one, because of course it is totally absurd to have a men's and a women's faculty club on one campus." To which I certainly agreed. I said, "It is absurd." It was forced in very curious ways. I would not blame the women, but I sure think we ought to figure out how to merge.

"Well," Peg said, "we've had some trouble already. We actually merged about two years ago, with the result that the manager of the Men's Faculty Club came up and took all the dishes away and all of our furnishings and said he was going to use this for a filing storage system."

(I said, "Oh, oh, there we go again with those carrels.") Now this you probably heard from Josephine Smith and other more vivid tale-tellers than mine.

Riess: Yes, the infamous Chuck Walters.

Miles: Yes, yes, yes.

"So it was all dropped because there was such a passion at that point, but now we are almost consummating a deal for merger. We have one more meeting." Peg said, "I do not understand why these men talk to us the way they do. They are very rude. I do not know how to cope. You have been on so many committee meetings, we thought it would be nice for you to be there and know how to talk to them."

Miles: I thought this was real funny because I probably had been defeated on more committee meetings than anybody in town. Anyway, she said, "We have also asked Bobbie..."

Riess: Bobbie who?

Miles: Bobbie [Babette] Barton, in the Law School, a very lovely woman.

"She is going to be on the board." I said, "Who else?" Then she mentioned the others and they were all, if you will pardon the expression, from P.E. The reason I "pardon the expression" is that these were the women that had given out in the first place. Mary Lou Norrie is a great gal...

Riess: You mean who hadn't considered it a battle worth fighting?

Miles: Yes, somehow they are, I do not know. Now those poor ladies are being beaten down by their new colleagues. They've got double in spades, I am afraid.

Anyway, I said, "They are giving into the, they are not backing you up there."

She said, "Now, how do you know that?"

I said, "Well, I have talked to them over many years."

"They are not backing me up. I cannot believe it."

I said, "Okay, Bea and I will come and back you up." *

Well, it is an unpleasant story and I do not want to tell it in detail. We came to the afternoon meeting and those guys were like-- I have never seen people like that before, even when they barred the door at the club. There was a fellow there by the name of [Phillip] Johnson. I will only mention his name. He is a lawyer. I have really forgotten the name of the president of the Men's Faculty Club.

They said that they did not need to explain it to us because we were new members of the board. Their own new members had come back on in November, and it was too late to explain it to us. I said, "It is never too late if we do not understand."

"Oh, yes it is, we do not want to waste our time going over this all over again."

It was a silly dialogue. So at some point, I think Bea or somebody said, "In other words, your idea of merger, is really as far as we are concerned, submerger." Well of course, I mean, how else can it be? You cannot have two clubs conflicting back and forth. One has to give into the other. It is obvious.

*Unclear. Bea may be Babette Barton.

Miles: I said, "I think we should petition for another meeting before we do any voting here."

Riess: You were brought into the meeting at which things were going to be decided? Peg Uridge could have gotten onto the situation a little earlier.

Miles: She could have, but you see she did not realize that her board was going to vote against her until the last minute.

So I said we needed another meeting. Then Johnson said something like, "Oh, you women always fiddling around and not making up your minds!"

Bea stood up and said, "Thank-you for the opportunity to meet with you and we will be glad to meet with you again sometime when your attitude has changed." She was great!

Fortunately my helper was waiting out there, so we could both make an exit, which we did. It was great. That was the end of that merger because they were too mad at us. Peg, of course, was happy. Then Peg was able to put their finances on their feet.

Riess: So they did not try other means. They just felt at that point that they were well rid of you.

Miles: Us. Yes, we were "shilly-shallying." They would wait until we all got tired or something.

Riess: Of course, Josephine Smith might maintain that they were doing it all for financial reasons anyway.

Miles: To get their debt wiped out. Oh, sure.

Riess: Do you think that is it?

Miles: Well, it was certainly an important factor. Also, you see, the Haas's offer was very fine. We needed reshingling, we needed new plumbing, we needed all the safety features. Both clubs got them. Even that would have been worth it. Then there was the debt. But the third thing is, why did they want to bother with us?

They would have been more profitable if we had joined them. Though the stipulations for joining were kind of funny. I mean, we were not welcome to come in there at any time and eat or anything like that. It was sort of limited what we could do.

Riess: Had you ever looked at the actual wording of the Haas offer to see in fact whether that was interpreted by Heyns as requiring merger?

Miles: I had understood that Heyns proposed it to Haas, not vice versa.

Riess: Proposed it to Haas and also proposed merger?

Miles: He proposed it for the men. He was anxious to get the women out of there. This is the way I am told. This is all second hand.

So the first hand stuff--and this is what I wanted to tell you about my unregenerateness--was when he had these board meetings, I just loved them. They were almost as interesting as the research meetings. We would have things like, "We cannot pay our bills for next month and we have got to raise the rent on the garages." (Those garages are gone now.) "Now, let us see, how much shall we raise them?" Then we spent three hours debating whether it should be fifteen dollars or twenty dollars.

Bea would say, "Look, we spent three hours on this, couldn't we come to some decision before ten o'clock?"

Peg would say, "I don't want to rush things."

Then Bea would say, "But I have to go."

I would say, "Well, couldn't we have some principle for how much to raise the garage rent? Like, for example, how much do we need?" I would say, "Just for jokers, I will move that we raise the rents twenty dollars a garage."

Everybody, "Jo! Don't you realize that Susan Smith could never afford twenty dollars a month?" I would go out of there just laughing! I guess I am just very fond of general principles. These ad hominem arguments over everything just defeated me. Peg, busy as she was, was that way. So, I do think there is something you can say about women, at least that group of women.

Riess: You have made the point that you believed in discussion, and your students would say to you, "Let us just cut this talk out." Decision-making was something you were learning from your students?

Miles: No, not quite, it was a little different from that. Our department was wonderful at having meetings, decision-making meetings. They were just really terrific. George Stewart and Jim Caldwell were two men of principle--ACLU principle and all kinds of good principle. They kept us steadily to principle.

But the students of the sixties wanted to work by osmosis, not by argument or principle. They would say, "Do not hassle us." They would just sit there quietly, and decide. They would not talk to Miles: each other. They would just sit there quietly and then one student would say, "Let's meet Thursday at three." They would say, "Okay." Then they would all get up and leave, without even asking me if that was okay. It was osmosis.

Riess: Osmosis is a mysterious process.

Miles: The kids--I am hoping they will do that again. They worked together wonderfully in the sixties with a sense that they understood each other and they did not need to argue, or their word "hassle."

Riess: But it was because they scorned this kind of waste of time, they scorned the process?

Miles: Well, they scorned argument. They scorned conflict. They just wanted to decide by getting the same feeling together. Now that was not Peg. Peg wanted to talk it all through. She wanted to talk it through in terms of every single possible instance, of everybody who might suffer.

She just did not want to draw principles like, "Let us raise the rents on some basis." So, no, those were very different. Her meetings were very systematic, but so detailed that you would go out just tearing your hair.

6) The Club for Now, and the Future

Miles: When Peg died, Katherine Williams became president, and she had also had a marvelous executive job [with the university], even better than Peg's, assigning rooms to professors all over campus--she was really embattled. She has been a real miracle worker. Peg was wonderful to turn the tide from nothing to something, but Williams has just been phenomenal. She has got it on the basis it is now, which is that we are actually making money, men are pouring into the club membership, the lunches are pretty good, and her board meetings, I hear, are just marvelous. They take half an hour. If there is any problem, we have two lawyers on the board now. They always clear these matters up, it is so great.

She was telling me about something the other day about some really knotty issue. The lawyers looked at her in amazement and said, "It is not a knotty issue. You look at it this way." She did, and everybody applauded and that was that.

I am not going to say that there are not good women other than lawyers there; of course there are. There is a tendency, when some kind of women get together, I think, in a club meeting atmosphere,

Miles: to ignore everything but the fascinating details. It is nice in a way. It was a great phenomenon to me who had heard it all in a faculty setting where they were pretty rigorous. So, that about brings me to the end I guess.

Riess: Peg began the process of turning it around, and Katherine Williams completed it? This is the strength of women now, or of the presidents?

Miles: Well, sadly, I am afraid, it is partly the strength of those two women picked. They are not faculty members. The club is more and more administrative women. This makes me so angry and sad. I thought of this this morning when I was thinking of you. I thought, in freshman English we often tell a student if you do not know what the end of something is, go back and read your first sentence. I thought of what my first sentence would be, and it would have Pauline Sperry in it.

Pauline Sperry's feeling then was that women owed something to each other as separate from what they owed to humanity. I was converted to it, and I did not believe it to begin with. I am now converted to it, and I am now finding that it is against the new style. Women do not want to do it now.

The women in our department say--I have quoted this, probably, for you--"If I thought that I was in this department for any reason because I am a woman, or that I had been helped to get here by women, I would quit." They look right at me when they say this. They know that I am thinking of twelve or thirteen women who dedicated ten years to getting them there. That makes one angry. It is a kind of self pride that will not face participation as a person.

So, it is sad. I mean, in other words, everything I learned was great for me, and I am terribly glad that women helped me learn it. But, it is now useless again.

Riess: Are they in the Men's Faculty Club? Are they choosing to join there?

Miles: Some of them join the men's, not too much. Marian Diamond is an officer. Some of them do for one thing: it is a shorter distance than up here. But no, not many, and not as many in proportion as we have.

The men here, I do not know if you have read any of their letters, but they are so nice and so loyal. You know what they are praising, don't you?

Riess: The food.

Miles: Isn't that a regression?

Riess: Yes, of course.

Miles: They are not having any intellectual debates with anybody.

Riess: Can you think of anything that is going on around the club here now that is intellectual?

Miles: Not the way it was in the sixties. We had marvelous meetings in the sixties. I remember one meeting where a black kid got up and threw his glass at the speaker, a glass of wine at the speaker. Now that does not sound as if I should boast about it. But, that kid felt so deeply: the speaker was saying that practice was not as important as spontaneity, and this kid said that his folks had made him practice the violin for nineteen years and he was not going to listen to anybody say that, and he threw his glass.

The club in the sixties was a host to that ferment, but did not necessarily create it. It was just a host.

Right now they are absolutely desperate to find a president after Katherine leaves, or a board of directors. Nobody wants to carry these burdens. There is not that much loyalty per se, as there was essentially in Peg. I think Katherine has enjoyed it for its own sake. She is a great manager. She loves getting the kitchen fixed up. I think for her it has been a good retirement job. For Peg, it was a real challenge from the women's point of view. But there is nobody else now.

Elizabeth and I, I should mention this, about three years ago, tried to start this intellectual club again. Not in the evenings, because nobody comes on campus in the evenings, supposedly, but at noon. Sue Ervin-Tripp, by the way, had lots of lunches for women assistant professors--to just tell their problems, and how to help get promoted, and so on. So, yes, in the past five years, Sue and Elizabeth, and to a little extent I, have done some work. We have tried to get women together to talk about their problems.

Riess: Not talking about their research any more though, just about their problems?

Miles: Well, that is what is so funny. About every other meeting, I would say, "Now look people, I want to make a speech before everybody goes home. I want to say, it is fascinating to hear about how you can or cannot get promoted in the Sociology Department, but, isn't anybody doing any interesting research?" Sometimes they would take up the challenge. Some of them would come and tell us some.

Miles: Elizabeth wrote me a note the other day saying that she had written around and nobody had volunteered any. Now, it does not mean they are not doing it, but it means that there is not any women's cohesive spirit. There are only two times, you see, that I lived through it. One was in the forties which was a hangover from the thirties. Then the other was in the sixties and seventies, or the seventies was a hangover from the sixties--which was very different from the first one, but also had lots of life and energy.

I will make one other sentence here. Elizabeth, the statistician, and another woman, who was on a committee with me, who was a graduate student--what was her name? A very fine person, you should have her name.

Anyway, they asked the question, "Why do 16 percent of the men graduate students drop before they get their degrees, and 42 percent of the women?" Then they interviewed, and then they did all the study they could. The main result is that we set up what we called a "hand-holding committee" for the women. The women are now dropping at exactly the same rate as the men. So we really did a roughly 20 percent good job.

That proves something about what they need. It does not inspire me very much. Again, it is not one of the things that urges me to greater heights.

Riess: It sounds like you are saying that women have to be taught to be nice to each other.

Miles: [giggle] "You have to be carefully taught?!" I do not know. I am puzzled by it. I just wrote a poem which said, "When I was a little girl, my mother was trying to get out the vote. She took me with her, knocked on all these doors and asked all these women to vote for the vote in California in 19__," whatever it was, '16, '15, whatever. "I said, 'Mother, why are you doing this?' 'Just because after the women get the vote, there will be no more war'." So, I just end with that question.

In a way, that is the same thing, isn't it? Women have a certain power of really working idealism. Maybe you are right, maybe it just has not been exercised enough.

Riess: Marian Diamond had a lunch group. What that a "hand-holding" group or a research group?

Miles: It was a "Marian Diamond group." She would ask women questions, and we would answer. Her lunches were fun, and it was fun to see the people. It did not concern anything of what I would hope sometime we, women, could have. As you see, I am the last one to be talking about what women should do. Yet, as I say, I got enough of that in those two different instances to know that it is possible. I just don't know why it is so infrequent.

Riess: Well, I hope you keep thinking about it, and observing it and so on. I think it is very interesting. I wonder what the club's future is going to be? What do you think?

Miles: I think it is going to go up and down, as before. Katherine, I think, will hold it together, unless she gets terribly impatient. If she can find somebody to be president that will hold it together for a few more years--how much that continuity could be created, I don't know.

I will come right now! [to helper]

Riess: Do you think it makes a difference that the board is dominated by administrative people?

Miles: By administrative we mean Law Department, Library Department, some administrative assistants.

Riess: Deans of women, and Sproul Hall people.

Miles: Yes. It is not that they are dominated by it, that is what they mostly are.

I have just been inviting all the new graduate students in English--not all, but the ones I meet--to join. It only costs one dollar a month, if you can imagine, for graduate students. Just this year for the first time, about six or seven have joined very enthusiastically and said, "What a bargain!" Now this is a different reason. Maybe economics will [do it].

Okay, Bill. [to helper]

1) Background, Education and Employment

Riess: First of all, tell me a little bit about yourself and your background.

G-B: In early 1914 I was in this country with my father and mother to visit. We came by rail through the United States.

Riess: This was war time?

G-B: It was just before the war started. We got home to Norway just in time.

I had received permission from school and every week I had to write a resumé of what I had seen and why. The "why" was very important to my teacher because she said, "That's when we know what you have been doing, and we hear about where you have been and what you really saw." So, I had to do that on my first visit to California. It was very interesting for me, too, because I did learn a lot by doing that page every week. It was mailed to my teacher every week. She read it in her classes.

I remember the first time that I used an American slang-- I had been told that we were to pay five cents, "a nickel," on the streetcar. So, I wrote that I paid a nickel, everybody paid a nickel. That page was returned to me by my teacher with a big red note saying, "I do not accept slang." I had to re-write the full page and then return it to my teacher--she was an excellent teacher. Do you know, to this day it's five cents! It is not a nickel.

Then in 1927 we were here on a visit again, but my mother at that time became desperately ill. After my mother passed away, my father returned to Norway and I stayed on. I met my husband, and we established our home.

Riess: Did you go on with schooling here?

G-B: No, I had all my schooling in Norway. I attended school for my American citizenship, which I got in 1950. That was very interesting. And it was a beautiful experience. I made up a little book about my American citizenship. I like it very much to sort of look back and see what's happened and how scared I was.

Riess: Was your husband an American citizen?

G-B: Yes, he was an officer in the United States Navy.

Riess: Your hyphenated name, is that your name plus his?

G-B: No, no, it's Scot and British, his parents.

Riess: How did your connection with the university and the Women's Faculty Club begin?

G-B: My husband passed away and, of course, I had to get to work. I couldn't just sit, you know, and it was war years.

I was not a citizen at that time my husband passed away, so when I had to go to work I was pretty scared, because the first question each time that I went in for an interview was, "Are you an American citizen?" And when I said, "No," I could see the chair sort of move a bit.

I was accepted at Capwell's for my first part-time job. I did get a little experience about being with people and listening to all this real fast manner of talking. And, of course, all the new words! I had a little pad in my pocket. I wrote up all the words that I didn't understand. When I came home, in the evening, I took the dictionary, and tried to, you know, follow the words that they had told me. So, it was lovely. Really, they were so nice to me.

Then I heard that there were openings at Breuner's. I went there and I was accepted. I worked myself up to a nice work. I was purchasing agent for fourteen years. I worked there for fifteen years. But Breuner's has a habit of firing employees every two or three years. They think that someone else should come in. They've always done that--so, I was fired. In between, they fired quite a few from the store.

2) Women's Faculty Club Office Job, 1959

G-B: Then I had to look for something else. And, of course, I asked everybody if they knew of something, because at that time I had worked for fifteen years and I had experience, of course, very good experience. But it was at that time, too, when people at forty shouldn't work anymore. You remember that? It was a little hard. So, I had friends asking about everything.

Suddenly one evening I received a telephone call that the manager of the Women's Faculty Club tells us that they are looking for someone to help in the office. "Tomorrow they will call you for an interview." So, I went up and it was Mrs. [Amy] Bumstead who was the office manager there, we had a nice little visit--she had been in Europe many years--and she accepted me. She said she would give the information to the board of directors, and of course it would be up to them, but evidently they accepted me too.

Riess: Who introduced you to Mrs. Bumstead?

G-B: It was Mrs. Caroline Radcliffe, who was the club manager then. First I was the assistant, with Mrs. Bumstead.

Riess: You became full-time in October 1960?

G-B: Yes.

Riess: Who else was the staff then, at that time?

G-B: It was just the two of us. We had someone come in from four 'til nine because those that lived there, [felt] that they shouldn't open the door themselves; someone should come and open the door for them.

Riess: [laughter] You mean the residents needed to have a door person?

G-B: Yes.

Riess: I can tell by the expression on your face that you have some feeling about that. [laughter]

G-B: Well you know, after all, when you come home, you open your own door. But that was it, you see, it was special there. When they started to have trouble on the campus, it was the campus police that suggested that we close earlier so that no one would have to walk through campus. So we closed at six, which was horrible for those that lived there. But they realized they didn't have anything to say about that.

Riess: This was in the beginning of the sixties?

G-B: Yes.

Riess: That meant a six o'clock curfew?

G-B: All that lived there had their own keys of course. And we did not serve dinner. So they had to go out.

I should mention that also on our staff was Mrs. Virginia Vail. She worked with us in the office on week-ends and when we needed extra office assistance. She, too, had worked on campus--so she knew many of our members. It was so nice--Virginia was loved by everyone, always helpful, dependable, capable, and we knew the office had excellent attention when she was there.

3) Arrangements for the Residents

Riess: I looked at the job description for the office assistant. I don't know whether you've ever seen your job description?

G-B: No, what did I do?

Riess: Well, I thought I would tell you what you did and then you could make some comments on doing it. [laughter] Everyday you had to check the meal chits and do something about security.

G-B: Yes, if any windows had to be opened, I had to do that, because it should say there that I was definitely a clerk. Everybody in the building referred to me as "the clerk" and the clerk should do everything. So, I was definitely the clerk until Miss Murdock came to the office as manager. Mrs. Bumstead resigned and Miss Murdock replaced her. She changed my title to assistant; so nice of her to do that, for me.

When I came, in the morning, I had to open all the doors that they thought should be open. Then I opened the office and I went to the vault and I opened it and took all the books out and then locked it again. But in the evening, before I left at four, I had to close all the windows and lock all the doors and see that the kitchen was under control. It was funny, you know, I had to do all this.

Then I had to take the newspaper, the Berkeley Gazette--that was a day paper at that time--up to Mrs. [Mary B.] Davidson. I had to knock on her door and then just leave it. I couldn't open

G-B: the door. And I had to wait for that paper, I could not leave. If it was four-thirty or five o'clock and the paper wasn't there. I had to wait.

Riess: That was a very special arrangement, in that case?

G-B: Yes.

Riess: She asked you to do that?

G-B: She didn't ask me, she told me. There's a difference. I was told because I was a clerk. That was all right with me, I was at work, so that didn't bother me any.

Someone that didn't care for all this ordering people around, she said, "If you miss a window or a door you will hear about it the next morning. So, be real careful because Miss Dornin takes care of all the windows, all the doors, all the lights, and, when someone is reading in the library at nine o'clock, she says, 'It's time to lock up,' and she turns off the lights." It was sort of double check.

So, I was very careful but after all we're all humans. Once in a while, if a window--you know, somebody could have opened that window. All the rooms do not have cross circulation; they have one window. Then in the summertime they would go and open the window in the hallway. Of course, I closed it at four. Well, at six, seven, or eight o'clock, she found a window open. I hadn't closed it. That was my fault, it was open.

Riess: It's all so petty, isn't it?

G-B: But that was the atmosphere of the club, because the people that lived there, it was their home. On a hot summer day, and we do have hot summer days, that basement [office] was sort of hot. All we had was the windows. We were not allowed to keep the front door open "because it was a home; it was not a building."

Riess: This feeling, on the part of the residents, that it was their home, therefore everybody who worked there were their servants, did this come up in board meetings? Did they try to work this out?

G-B: No, I don't think so. I think the board members very much agreed with it. Quite a few of them had lived there that were on the board.

Riess: Who was Mrs. Davidson?

G-B: Dean Davidson. She also had a table in the dining room with her reservation on it. It was just a table for two and only one chair because she did not want company.

Riess: It sounds like there were a few primadonnas.

G-B: Yes, that's why we had the Family Table. When we received visitors from other countries--at that time, they came by ship, and they had trunks--some of those who lived there would come to the office and they'd say, "How many trunks did she bring?" [laughter] If we said, "One," they couldn't sit at the Family Table. If they brought two, they were accepted.

Riess: What does that mean?

G-B: I suppose it meant that they would have a little more money if they brought two, and maybe a little more wardrobe.

Riess: Who ran the Family Table?

G-B: Miss Czarnowski and Miss Dornin. No one sat at the Family Table except the residents and the people they chose. But you see, it was their home.

It was desperately hard to be a manager to them. Mrs. Radcliffe needed things for the club, tablecloths or something like that, or maybe something for flowers--"We can't afford it." There was a "no" most of the time from the board. Mrs. [Lucille] Phipps had the same thing.

Mrs. Phipps managed, somehow, to open the library for special luncheons, like for a little birthday lunch, when you don't want to be in the main dining room. There was someone that asked and she said, "Oh, surely you can be in the library." There was quite a discussion afterwards. She was really reprimanded for doing that.

But sometimes things happen that should happen, and one day it did: one of the members of the board of directors had friends coming and they were very important friends. She probably wanted to have it real nice. So she asked Mrs. Phipps if she could have it in the library. Mrs. Phipps said, "I have been reprimanded for this so I don't know. You'll have to find out from the board of directors." Being that she was one of them, [chuckle] she said, "I'll take that responsibility."

Mrs. Phipps had to bring tablecloths from her home all the time in order to make it a nice luncheon. She brought other things to make it nice, because all we had were crude, really. (All the G-B: good silver was kept in the vault and could not be used except like for the Women's Faculty Club tea; it wasn't like now at all.) It was a beautiful table when she finished; we saw it, she was so proud.

She had closed the door when everything was ready. And of course, you know, there was somebody coming down the steps, opening the door. But no one was supposed to go into the lounge or library. They were supposed to stay there and look in from the foyer like. They saw this, and of course, "Who ordered this?" Then they were told that it was one of the board of directors.

Well, that sort of established it. I think it was sort of ironed out in the board of directors meeting that it should be opened for all the members.*

4) The Managers

Riess: Mrs. Phipps had quite a long term, as manager, didn't she?

G-B: Yes, she was very well accepted. She was a very good manager. As a manager when you ask for things to make things go better and nicer and the answer is "no", it is always the manager that will be blamed for that, for not being interested, because the board of directors will not tell you that they said, "We can't afford it." Which they could afford. They had the money. But it was just anything new. It was just, they felt because they had it, why buy new things?

Riess: The board of directors changed every year, but you're saying their philosophy never changed?

G-B: There were always some staggered, since their terms were staggered. That's all that was needed.

Riess: When Mrs. Phipps left around 1966, did she retire?

G-B: Yes, Mrs. Phipps retired at that time. But then they asked her to come to Strawberry Lodge. She went down there. She was just going to help out, but they liked her so well, they added more and more and made her the manager rather than help.

*See further stories appended.

Riess: So she went on there and then she was replaced by Mrs. [Patricia] Barnes. Did these managers hire the cook? What is their relationship to what comes out of the kitchen?

G-B: Really I don't know just how that is done. I think Mrs. Radcliffe had hired Katy Martin. She was with us till we closed the dining room for the merger. She belonged to the union. She was an excellent cook.

Riess: I wondered what connection the managers had to the quality of the kitchen.

G-B: That you have to ask Miss Murdock, because I don't know. I don't know, because the board of directors meetings, I didn't attend. And there was very little that was told to us. Miss Murdock. She was a member, she had lived at the club for a while. She was a member of the board of directors. She was a president, too. That gave a different feeling and a different atmosphere in the office all together. It was joyful.

5) Working with the Men's Club

Riess: [laughter] Now, to keep on some kind of a track here, I was going through the job description of the office assistant. So, checking the meal chits. Then weekly, you had to do something about reciprocity with The Faculty Club.

G-B: Yes, for members of our club that went to the men's club. And some of the men came to our club, like on Thursdays, because we had roast beef and popovers on Thursday. That was just a man's dish. So on Thursdays we had visitors from the men's club, believe it or not. All those chits had to be added up and typed and sent over to the men's club. So that I had to do every week, too. Then, at the end of the month, I would add up the totals of the four weeks and then send a bill over to them.

The office manager over there, he would just take the tape, come over, and say, "Well, this is it, here's your check." That was all there was to it. Mr. Smith was his name. We had a beautiful association with him. He was marvelous to work with. He used to come and sit down on the chair and he'd have a cup of coffee and when he laughed his tummy would go up and down, like a Santa Claus! But we had to be sure that it was correct because we didn't want anything to happen. So that's what I had to do.

Riess: Was there much use of the men's club by the women?

G-B: Some of them were always there. [chuckles] So, then they sent the bills over to us. On our bills it says Women's Faculty Club and Men's Faculty Club, so it would go in the different slots on their bill.

Riess: What happened when the men came over? Did they have to make a reservation ahead of time or could they just walk right in on Thursdays?

G-B: Sometimes they would, they would probably have extra fellows with them to introduce them to roast beef and popovers and apple pie. They would. And then some of the members would too, so they were sure that the table was ready. So I had to do that, too.

Riess: Was that an issue for the residents, that there were all these men there on Thursdays?

G-B: No, I think they got used to it when Katy came. Mrs. Radcliffe knew really how to handle them with a silk glove and at the same time make them feel that, yes, it was their decision. She knew how to do that.

6) The Auditor

Riess: Monthly you had to prepare for the visit from the auditor. I think that plan started in 1957 or when Mrs. Bumstead left. She suggested that the Women's Faculty Club get a professional firm for the monthly closing of the books. Is this a usual practice to do it that way?

G-B: I think it should be because it does give the board of directors the right to ask questions and it also gives them the feeling that the office is in good hands. Mrs. Bumstead was a certified public accountant. That's why they didn't have it before.

Riess: When she was there they didn't have it?

G-B: She had worked on campus. They knew her because she was with the student union, the ASUC. She was the manager of that for many, many years. But after she left, I do think it was excellent because I felt much that when he came that everything was in order. I could ask him questions. It was a wonderful feeling when he came. I was just looking forward to it. When Miss Murdock became manager, she had the same feeling that he was the one that gave the report.

G-B: We didn't. We had to deal with it, because we had to prepare it and have it ready for him, but the results that he sent over to the board of directors, that was his. We enjoyed it very much.

We enjoyed one [accountant] we had very much. The day he left, I got into trouble with Miss Czarnowski. Miss Murdock and I, we were shocked when he came and said, "Today's the last day," and we said, "Oh, no!" But he was going to open his own office in Walnut Creek, so naturally he didn't want to come to us anymore. We were just heartbroken. Miss Murdock said, "We ought to have a good cup of coffee today, could you go up and fix something?" [chuckles]

I had to make it festive, so I went out to the vault and I got a silver tray and all the nicest things I could find. I said, "There should be a flower there too." Miss Czarnowski made the arrangements, flower arrangements. She didn't "take care of the flowers," she "made the arrangements," a higher level. Nobody dared to do anything about it.

I went into the dining room. I thought, gee, there ought to be a flower I could pick. And I looked and looked and suddenly as I walked about, I saw there was one. She had a rose, sort of tucked in. She didn't want to give it to us in the basement, because we got all the leftover roses. We could never have new ones because that was for upstairs. But there was this one, just sort of put there. It wasn't arranged inside or anything because I sort of [plucked it] and all of a sudden I had it. I put it on one side of the tray.

Katy liked him too, and when we came up to get some coffee for him she said, "He's leaving? You just wait a minute, I'll have popovers." I was just delighted! I said, "I'll take the tray down, and then you bring the popovers." I came with the tray and I put it on the desk, and Miss Murdock was so pleased. She said, "Cookies?" And acted like this [whispers, gesture]. Here came Katy, knocking on the door, she said, "How would you like to have some hot popovers and some butter?" We just, "whoo!" So that was a delightful sort of ending.

But after that [auditors] just came and went. We didn't get [attached to them].

Riess: Miss Czarnowski never missed that flower?

G-B: Yes, she did! And she came down to the office and gave me a bawling out to the extent that Miss Murdock had to stop her. Later Miss Murdock told her to write me a note and tell that she was sorry she had spoken to me like that.

Riess: Did she?

G-B: She did. I will give her credit for that. But she was outraged that I would touch her arrangements. I didn't know a thing about flowers, you know. Nobody knew anything. But the day I retired from the club she wrote me a real nice letter. I so much appreciated her good wishes, and being friends, again.

Riess: I've seen pictures of her arrangements. They're always very artistic.

G-B: Yes, they were beautiful. She had the flower garden and we were never allowed to go out and take a rose.

Riess: Was that in the front, or in the back?

G-B: In the front. The rose bushes are still there. But of course it probably isn't given tender loving care like before.

7) The Public Relations Part of the Job

Riess: [continuing job description] As needed, you kept the member ledger cards up-to-date.

G-B: Yes, because I did the billing on the ledger cards. I did all billing. Statements were mailed once a month to all the members.

Riess: And you cut stencils for menus. You checked office supplies. You did PR work, public relations. That must cover a multitude of good and bad things, because they describe public relations as contact with the residents, taking messages, mail.

G-B: Sure, because the telephone we had then was so we could contact every room. If there was a caller, we couldn't take her right up; even though we knew that they were expected, we couldn't do that. We had to telephone and say, "Miss So-and-so is here, if it's convenient for you to see her." If it was, then we said, "Yes, you may go up, and her room number is such-and-such."

Riess: They would receive people in their rooms or would they come down to the lounge?

G-B: Sometimes they would come down. If it was a man, of course, they would come down, except Mrs. Davidson, her son always went upstairs. But he too, had to be telephoned to go on up. Can you imagine?

Riess: In that great big, wonderful university, essentially a democratic place, the Women's Faculty Club had some backward views.

G-B: But, of course, when they grew up, they grew up in this, that there were them and then there were those down there. You must favor those above you. I think that's how they grew up.

Riess: They were all single women, weren't they, except Mrs. Davidson?

G-B: Yes. Mrs. Bumstead wasn't, and she lived there. But about all the others were single. But that shouldn't have anything to do with it, because they were with people everyday. It shouldn't be that that should be something special that you had to keep away from, because they were working with them, they were colleagues. So why be so [rigid and unpleasant], you know? They did have to show mutual respect. And it shouldn't be just for an evening or some special occasion.

Riess: Over the years your name would come up in the minutes.

G-B: [chuckle] What I didn't do?

Riess: Nothing bad. Let's see. "Mrs. G. GB. had been working on Saturdays."

G-B: That was my nickname, because my name was too long, so G. GB. I even signed G. GB.

Riess: You had been working on Saturdays and you were paid extra for that.

G-B: You know, when you are working and you like where you are, you have to give.

Riess: Occasionally some good soul would bring attention to the fact that you had been putting in more hours.

G-B: I was expected to do other duties, too.

Riess: You were expected to be there until the Gazette came.

G-B: Yes, I wasn't paid overtime for that, because I was expected to do that. I mean that was one of the things that went with the office, and that's all there was to it.

Riess: Somebody should have taken some responsibility for a more equitable arrangement.

G-B: Miss Murdock was a friend of all of them, and to me, too. It put her in a very hard position. They would say, "Margaret, I want that done." So, what does Margaret do? Still, it put her in a very hard position, because she had lived there. She didn't just open the door and come in, which would have made it a little different atmosphere I think.

She constantly had to do it. I admire her for it because she constantly had to. She did have beautiful, beautiful manners to keep them satisfied. Beautiful. She is so precious. I do admire her for how she really managed all of them.

We had a little joke between us. Most of it, we just had to chuckle, because we just couldn't be under that strain. We had to do something to explode. About ten thirty, in the morning, from the third floor we would hear creak, creak, creak, all the way down. We did not have carpets on the stairs. Then we would look up and say, "Wonder what their complaints are today." We would be writing and writing and looking this way instead of this way. Miss Murdock sometimes would pick up the telephone and sound busy. [But she would look up to find out what this person wanted.] It would be a complaint that, oh, there probably was coffee in the saucer or somebody had left a window open and didn't close it, had promised to close it. Or somebody had taken books from the library and didn't sign for them. All these little minute problems.

And we'd say, "What did you expect me to do? I wasn't even here. So, why didn't you tell her this morning at the breakfast table?" But oh, no, it was up to the office, of course, to the manager, because that couldn't be done by the residents.

At Christmastime, I always invited those residents that couldn't get home--not anyone that lived there, of course, but those that couldn't get home, I invited them to have Christmas with me. I celebrate a Norwegian Christmas. I would write up what the program was because I wanted them to know. If they were with different religions, I respected that, but I also wanted them to enjoy it with me. I would write this and send it to them.

Everybody accepted, and oh, they loved it! There were some that I didn't think would even walk about the Christmas tree with me. But they did and enjoyed it. I had each one sing a Christmas or, I didn't call it Christmas, a favorite song. And they enjoyed that too.

G-B: It was just a different sort of work. Because it wasn't really just office work. They came to the office and they had a little visit with us. I do think that quite a few of them were lonely. Once in a while there would be a "How do you do." But that terrific, stiff, cold acceptance from the Family Table. You can't live with that. You have to have some warmth. So they used to come to the office and Miss Murdock and I, we would chuckle with them. She did a beautiful job keeping them all in order.

Riess: What was Miss Murdock's formula for dealing with it, do you think?

G-B: She had been reared in a different atmosphere. Her father was an author and he was part of San Francisco. There was a different atmosphere because there were different races about her. She got used to that. They were all there. She heard of all this. So, she had that in her background.

8) The Abbos

Riess: The next manager then was Gaston Abbo. And it was interesting to read, in the minutes, his application for this job. He had been managing hotels in India and Indonesia and Malaysia.

G-B: Can't you imagine him coming to the Women's Faculty Club? Can't you imagine the explosion?

Riess: Well, I think it depends on him, what kind of an explosion. He sounds like he was a very sophisticated character.

G-B: Yes but he was too sophisticated for the Women's Faculty Club. Typical French, and he dazzled everybody. He sold himself beautifully. That was very easy, very easy. And he was on his own, definitely on his own. And they accepted him until things started to go. Then it was just too expensive, it really was.

Riess: Did he bring his own cook?

G-B: No, we had our own. Katy. Katy Martin. Katy knew she was a good cook. She could have something special, too. She agreed with that. She said, "If he tells me I'll do it. I have to." But she enjoyed it thoroughly.

Riess: So, he did more continental and exotic things?

G-B: Oh, yes, and she would say, "Well now, I don't know how to do that." She said, "You tell me how I can make it." But it wasn't always he could. [laughter] Katy said, "You have to give me the recipe for that in English." And he couldn't do that. So then we just sort of went back to creamed tuna and what have you.

Katy wanted very much to do different things, but if you read the menu from week to week, you knew that the first week of the month and the last week of the month would be about the same, except maybe it was just turned around a little bit, you know, the salad came before the main entree or something of that sort.

But there were lots of times that Katy sort of pushed in little things, just to try. And, of course, it would be accepted. She enjoyed that.

Then when Mr. Abbo came he said, "You call it what?" She would give him the name. That wasn't fancy enough. So, the two of them would try to figure the American name and the French name and then get a name in between. But no, that didn't work. They just had a ball out there in the kitchen, the two of them.

Once in a while Katy would say, "You tell me all these things to do them, but you can't tell me how, so let me do it my way." Then he would walk out. No, he couldn't do that. "She couldn't talk to him like that!"

Riess: [laughter] Who settled their squabbles?

G-B: Mrs. Abbo. She was gentle. She had, more or less, been kept in the background, I think, because he was always there. She, of course, didn't take part in any of the restaurants that he was managing. Because they had their own servants where they had been. So, naturally, she had had a different life altogether. For her to sit in that little room at the Women's Faculty Club wasn't very nice. She had a very lonely time there.

Riess: They lived in the club?

G-B: Yes. They were the first managers that lived there. And of course, husband and wife, it was very disturbing to the others that lived there, you see, because after all, there was a man in there. But anyway, they lived through it.

But he served wine before dinner. At first he started in the library. There weren't very many that realized that it was served in there. So, then he put it out in the foyer there. And that [was very popular] until they realized they had to pay for it. [laughter]

G-B: He didn't want them to pay for it. It should be just gracious. He said, "When you have guests for dinner, don't you serve wine?" He said, "It's natural." But it wasn't, of course.

Riess: How long did that last?

G-B: Oh, it lasted for a few months. Then they had to pay for it. The board of directors said they had to pay for it, because the wine got to be a bit too expensive.

Riess: So, would it just go on their meal chits?

G-B: No, they had to pay out of their pocket. And you see, we didn't have a permit. If they paid, we had to have a permit. We didn't have a license to sell liquor. So, I think we kept it up for one week and we suddenly realized that we couldn't do it.

Riess: Did you suddenly realize or did somebody else?

G-B: No, I didn't suddenly realize it, but I think Miss Murdock did. When she was talking to others, they said, "How did you get a license?" So, the wine bottle went back on the shelf and all the wine glasses.

He bought champagne glasses. He bought wine glasses, one for red wine and one for liqueur. He bought them by the dozens.

Riess: But wouldn't he go to the board to request permission for all of this?

G-B: Well, he just said he needed it, and "I've already ordered it." So, what could they do? "I've already ordered and we expect them." Most of the time they were already there. But what would we need with champagne glasses? A case of champagne glasses, and one for the other wines, sherry glasses. They all had to be the best, which he was used to, but it didn't suit us at all.

Another thing, he didn't realize--union to him was something that he didn't understand at all. When he said, "go and do it" in those foreign countries, they did without objections, because they knew if they didn't they would be fired because there were a dozen there waiting to get his job. With union, you don't do that.

Riess: Who was union? Katy was union?

G-B: Katy was union. The salad-maker was union. The dishwasher was union. He would say, "You stay till dinner is over." They said, "No, we don't." He couldn't understand it. So he had an awful time with union. He didn't know one bit about unions.

And he didn't know about a license for wine. "A license for wine? You should have a license for coffee--but not for wine!"

Riess: So, he was a bit of an innocent, you would say?

G-B: But you don't expect men to be innocent either. He had been out in the world.

Riess: Something happened. He was in the hospital?

G-B: Yes, that was the excuse that they had to get someone else. He was actually ill. But that gave us the excuse. It was said very casually that we had to have someone else. Being union, that helped us.

Riess: Josephine Smith, in an executive session meeting, recommended that the Abbos be discontinued due to the financial irresponsibilities. That was in December 1969. Do you think that that was what really brought it to a head?

G-B: Of course, she took care of the finances. But we just couldn't keep it up. Because he just ordered frantically.

Riess: Did the men flock over to the Women's Faculty Club during the Abbos' tenure? Was it special for the men?

G-B: No.

Riess: Katy was still doing the popovers and roast beef anyway?

G-B: Yes. And she did serve an excellent roast beef. I can just see the men enjoying it thoroughly. But then, after a year or so, then they had a new cook over at The Faculty Club. And he got wind of this roast beef. So he started, but they still came to us.

9) The Breakfast Arrangements

Riess: When you arrived in the office in the morning, the residents had already had their toast and coffee or whatever?

G-B: Oh, no. Emma came in at six thirty o'clock to prepare breakfast for them. They were served in the private dining room. And Emma took care of the dining room and she helped in the kitchen. She would see that the tables in the dining room were prepared for lunch. So, she took care of that, and very well, too.

She would come in, but once in a while, the bread that they wanted wasn't there. So they had to come creak, creak, creak down the steps and report that. Maybe the coffee was stronger and so they had to come creak, creak down and tell that to us in the office.

She prepared breakfast. She had to boil the eggs for them, because they couldn't go out in the kitchen, and they didn't have anything in the dining room except the toaster. Then sometimes they'd just sit and wait for her to get the toast and serve the eggs to them.

But she was really good. "Oh well," she said, "they like to have something special." Once in a while, she would say, "For Goodness sakes, just because I didn't have raisin bread!" She would come down to the office and I would order for her. She would say, "Please, don't forget the raisin bread!"

Mrs. Davidson had breakfast in her room. We had the little kitchenette, but she prepared her breakfast in her room. She did have lunch in the dining room, and [we had to] be sure that her table was shiny and her reservation was there that it was the dean's, and if that ever was soiled, she would give it to Emma and say, "It's soiled, Emma, why don't you see it? Please type it over again please." So, we'd type it over again and put it back nice and shiny.

Riess: Josephine Smith became the volunteer auditor in February 1970, I believe. Were you still working there when she was that?

G-B: It was a different atmosphere altogether when she came. When there was something, why she'd just sit down and we'd talk it over, get it all clear and that was all there was to it. She said, "Everybody makes mistakes. And if they don't they don't work very hard."

Riess: Following Mr. Abbo, was Mr. Gedrose.

G-B: Yes.

Riess: And then Mrs. Florence Curtis?

G-B: Yes.

Riess: How long did she stay? I can't find it in the records.

G-B: Florence Curtis, she stayed till the day the merger had failed. She certainly wouldn't stay a day after that.

10) Joint Operations

G-B: I had a story about the merger.

Riess: You've written that up?

G-B: Yes, but I have no names in any that I have written, because if you use one name, you have to use them all.*

Riess: Josephine Smith talked about Mr. Walters coming to take the rugs from the Women's Faculty Club.

G-B: Yes, and he took everything from the kitchen too. And he wanted to come back and take everything from the other rooms. That's when we started to hide things. But I never had the key, and it made him furious!

Riess: Was this a matter of weeks or days or what?

G-B: Oh, it was a matter of months. It just went on and on. He entered when we first closed our building. "I should stay out."

And we would go over to The Faculty Club, Mrs. Curtis and myself, because we had lunch over there. We were still on the payroll of the Women's Faculty Club, so we were allowed to have lunch [traditionally part of reimbursement for work].

So, Walters wanted an interview with me, because I was to work for him. The Women's Faculty Club was now a property of his office. And he would take it over. So I should be interviewed. He told me then, he said, "I want you to work over there, I want you to come here once a day and tell me what they talk about, what they plan. Now," he said, "you will be reimbursed for that."

I said, "I don't work for you, I work for the Women's Faculty Club." That's when the feathers started to fly. I had to work for the Women's Faculty Club and they paid me. It was the beginning of his takeover; he referred to the building as his building.

*See Appendices.

G-B: When we closed the dining room, that was the beginning of the merger. That is the day. The day after, I was interviewed, and that's when he told me that that's what I should do. I said no.

Riess: He was going to pay you extra for that?

G-B: Yes, because he wanted to take it over. He wanted to be the person. From that day on, I was just mud. Whenever Mrs. Curtis and I came over to have lunch, he said, "Here come the free loaders." We didn't pay for it, the club paid for it. But to him, we didn't.

So, he had given us a table way, way back. Just good enough. It was way back. And one day, one of the members from The Faculty Club came over. He said, "What are you doing back there?" We said, "We're having lunch." Mrs. Curtis was Irish, so she said, "We're called the free loaders. So that's where we eat." He said, "Who called you that?" She didn't want to mention his name, just went like this. [gesture] He said, "Oh, no, no, no." So, after that we had a very nice table. We could almost sit where we wanted to.

It irritated Walters to the fact that he always had to come real close and sort of give our table a little push.

Riess: Oh, incredible! The dining room was closed at dinner. But also at lunch?

G-B: When the building closed, there was no more lunch. They all went to The Faculty Club. And they were billed over there. They came and took our ledgers, because the billing was to be done over there, we were not going to bill them anymore. And I fought for that for two weeks before they got them. Then he and the bookkeeper came over. The two of them, they just took the ledger cards. There was nothing left for me to do. I was the office manager then, and he wanted the key to the vault and he never got it.

Riess: The residents were still having their breakfast.

G-B: That was all. They had all their other meals outside. So, it was just a dead building, completely dead.

But then when they came that day, and took everything from the kitchen, then I alerted them. And it was Mary Lou Norrie who was president, at that time. But she was for the merger, very much so, which made it very uneasy for us. It wasn't very pleasant.

Riess: I can't understand why it ended up being your battle. I mean, it just seems outrageous that there weren't other people who weren't there helping you.

G-B: They couldn't help me because I was in the office and he came to the office.

Riess: I know, but the president herself, I mean, Mary Lou.

G-B: She was for it. So, that didn't help me any. Walters wanted to build a dining room between the two buildings, all glassed in. And our lounge would be where they would wait to be served. They could have wine over in The Faculty Club because they had the bar there. And then our lounge would be so that others would meet in our lounge and then go into this, enormous, big, beautiful glassed-in dining room. That was his dream.

Riess: It sounds kind of nice doesn't it, in a way? I mean, you can see what a wonderful dream it was?

G-B: Yes, but how would people get there? That's why he wanted the rest of our building to be torn down. Because he was going to use that for parking. So, that's when we started to say, "What will be done after you tear down our building?" That's when the cruel answer came. "We need parking." And that's when we started to revolt.

Riess: Mary Lou Norrie wrote in July 1972, "The plans for the first six months of joint operation did not work out as well as originally intended."

G-B: It was a very hard sentence for her to say, I am sure.

Riess: "The major faults seem to be the lack of supervision of work being done at our building and certain failures in communication between management, employees, and residents."

G-B: That's putting it mildly. [laughter]

Riess: Gudveig, it's hard to read these things and understand what it's really saying.

G-B: I think I have been a little sharper in what I have written myself because I had to deal with Walters every time he came. It was not very pleasant. He was sure that there was something in that vault that would make him star, the star of everything, and if he brought that it would be the beginning of the merger. Can't you see how beautiful their club would be? And of course, I was the one that always had to say, "I don't have the key."

Riess: And when Mrs. Uridge was president?

G-B: He never asked her for the key. Probably I would say, "Oh, have it," I would break down, but she wouldn't. She would probably tell him, "No, listen you are over there and I am here." So, nothing of that sort. He wasn't going to have a woman tell him anything.

Riess: At some point in this merger period, Mrs. Uridge took over as the president? [president, 1973-death in 1978]

G-B: She attended meetings over there and took notes, but she never said, "Yes, I am in favor of it," or "No, I am not in favor of it." She just went right in the middle all the way down. She just took notes and things.

But in the meantime, they raided our kitchen and then they wanted to come back and take some more. I'm sure that those poor fellows that came to raid the kitchen and took everything, when Walters realized that I had found out that they were going to come and get some more, I'm sure they were fired. They were probably kicked from here to there for saying such a thing. Because that was a secret.

11) The President and the Members, 1972-1976

Riess: While Mrs. Uridge was diplomatically working her way through this, what was the feeling on the part of the club members?

G-B: Well, there were some members that were in favor of it. They worked very, very hard because they were in favor of it. When the president Miss Norrie was in favor of it, we needed help. We really needed help. You wouldn't expect a president to do that, because, as a president, she knew the history of the club, or at least, she should, and realized all the work and plans and dreams of those that had catered to them and worked with that. She should be an interested president. And not just say, "Well, that's all over now. We have to progress." But that isn't the idea.

The members, they'd been members for many, many years and the club was part of them. The merger, it didn't register at first. They thought, "a merger, well we could try it." Then suddenly, when they realized that the building would go, that's when they really started and that was the last minute.

Everything progressed very slowly and suddenly, take it over and throw it away! Let's start something new! But I am very happy that somebody spoke up.

Riess: That was Mrs. Uridge?

G-B: Yes.

Riess: There had been proposals to turn the building into carrels for the history department, and other proposals.

G-B: Oh yes, and we had the place they started on campus where the working mother could leave the children.

Riess: The Women's Center?

G-B: Yes, we had that, because we should have that. And then we had all these children! You can imagine what the second and third floors' feelings were when they came in with the kiddies here. Then they put them down on the sofa and they changed the diapers on the sofa in the lounge.

Riess: What were your feelings about it?

G-B: Well, I didn't like it. No. I said, this is not a place for it.

Riess: Was it supposed to be permanent, this arrangement?

G-B: It was supposed to be permanent. But then it didn't seem to work out; there wasn't space enough and too many stairs, because they didn't have any place where they could wash the children or any place where they could feed them except in the dining room, and the chairs didn't fit, luckily. The tables were too tall, luckily. So, it didn't work out.

But they had offices on the second floor. They'd taken one, two, three of our rooms. And then everybody who lived on the second floor had to lock their rooms, because all of the little ones opened the door and they went in and had a good time looking at all these new things. And they didn't like to lock them. They were not used to having to lock their rooms.

Riess: Having the women's center there, did that protect the club from being taken over by something else?

G-B: Yes, I think it did. Because I think the board of directors realized that it was built as a home, not as a building.

Riess: "As of July 1, 1972, the representatives of the Women's Faculty Club, on the Joint Operating Committee, will assume complete responsibility for the operation and the staffing of the women's club building...The accounting and other record keeping required

Riess: by the Women's Faculty Club, as part of the Joint Operation, in connection with the operation of our clubhouse, will continue to be provided by the Joint Operation."

G-B: That was done over there. I don't know if any of our members had anything to do with it, because the billing was done there. They paid dues. I had to bring that over to The Faculty Club. And I wanted a receipt for the money, naturally. Some of it was in cheques but I didn't have the ledgers. So, I had them there and I had to bring it over to their club. Well, he didn't want me to have a receipt. Then I wouldn't give him the money. I said, "No receipt, no money." And walked out.

Well, it angered him that I should tell him that I didn't want to do what he wanted me to do. And the bookkeeper over there, he was between the devil and the deep sea like I was. I had a book and I recorded everything in that book. I did not have the ledger cards that I could record that they had paid their dues. So I had this little book. I hope they still have it. Because everything that I brought over there is recorded in that book.

Riess: Do you think that if you had given in to him, given him the keys, given him the books, given him the silver, what do you think the net outcome would have been?

G-B: Well, they would still be there.

Riess: So, even when the women's club took over its own operation, it would have been not feasible to go and retrieve all of that stuff?

G-B: I doubt it. I doubt it very much. Because there were so many there that were in favor of this that "the women don't need their own club, let's make it all one; in this era of the world we should be all one club."

Riess: But you think they would have hung on to the rugs and the silver?

G-B: Oh, definitely. They hung on to everything else.

Riess: In 1976 there was another vote on the merger.

G-B: Yes, that was the final I trust. I left in '76. It was about time. I had stayed one more year later, because they wanted to get somebody else. It took them a year, and it shouldn't have taken them a year, but due to the merger--

Riess: After Peg Uridge took over, things calmed down?

G-B: She took over when the merger started after Mary Lou left. She took over. She was not in favor of it, but she wasn't going to say so. She was smart enough and knowledgeable enough not to say, "yes." She wanted to find out firsthand, which, of course, saved the club.

She was excellent, because she talked with everybody, laughed with everybody. "Oh, yes, yes." But down deep, she didn't commit herself at all until that final vote.

Riess: In the meantime, the club was finding more money and friends?

G-B: Oh, yes, then we started to have people come in and stay, and get some money into the club. That's when all these people started coming in from the different worlds. It was just wonderful. By that time, all the others had left the club.

1) Family and Education

Scott: I was born in Fort Sill, Oklahoma, during World War I. My father retired when I was four years old and studied law. My family moved to Berkeley so that we could all go to the university. He could move--not exactly anywhere he wanted, but he had some flexibility. He also wanted to be close to an army hospital because his health was poor and my mother's health was poor.

Riess: Did he pursue a career in law?

Scott: Yes.

Riess: And was your mother a homemaker?

Scott: Yes, but she also assisted in this law. She wasn't actually a lawyer. In the first place, part of the time he was having trouble with his eyesight because he was in an automobile accident and lost one eye, and the other eye was injured. So she would read to him. She actually participated. During World War II, my mother was a technician in hormone research at the university.

I went to University High School, which was in Oakland, but the university had a part in its administration. It was established for experimental programs and to train student teachers. There was much more university training of teachers then, especially for high school. They also were having experimental courses and so forth. They had funds from various foundations and from the state for experimental programs. The school was located on Grove Street on purpose so that it would be in a district which was a low income district. Because of the special programs it would attract students from San Francisco and Berkeley and other places.

Riess: Did they try to have a balanced population racially?

Scott: That's right. Well, they wanted to have it represent this area. I think that was reasonably successful in doing that because the people in that district, close by, were admitted automatically.

Scott: But if you weren't there, particularly if you were from Berkeley, you had to apply for admission. They had to restrict the number of people coming from outside because it was too popular for people coming to attend it from San Francisco and Berkeley and Piedmont and other places.

Riess: Did it feel like an experimental place or just like a high school?

Scott: Well, you know, it was the only one I ever saw, but certainly the student teachers played a big role in it. No, I don't think we noticed the experimental element very much. I don't even know that it was even all that strong.

Then during World War II, afterwards somehow it got a smaller enrollment. No one seems to know why. They blamed [it on the fact] that it didn't have a good football team. Of course, it never had a good football team, so I don't think that was the real reason.

Riess: Did it channel people into the university?

Scott: Well, it certainly was very heavy academically. There were other courses available, but almost everyone was taking academic programs and going then to the universities here. Not this university in particular.

Riess: Was there a strong math program?

Scott: Yes, I mean all the courses were available, the four years [of math] were available. I was the only girl, however, in the upper courses. So there wasn't any channelling of people going into it. At that time I thought I wanted to be either an astronomer or an artist. I didn't know which one. I was carrying both those programs. I kept on doing that when I first came to the university.

Riess: So you came to Cal. Did you want to go farther away if you could have?

Scott: Well, I don't think I really had an option. You see, that was during the Depression. I really didn't have an option about going some place else. So, you know, I could live at home there. The university was very inexpensive in those days. I think it was $19 or something a semester. It was very inexpensive. I could walk.

Riess: Did you join a sorority?

Scott: Yes, but I didn't stay in. That was for a peculiar reason. You know, sororities meet on Monday night. I think they still do. These meetings are mandatory. I had a course in astronomy, an observing course, which was scheduled for Monday night. So, after the first year I took this course and I had to become inactive or whatever the right word was. I just stayed inactive after that. I didn't really get that much out of it.

Riess: Did you have women professors in your college days that you remember?

Scott: No, there were none. I met some women professors, or I saw some women professors. Well, in physical education, of course, but you were thinking about academic courses. They were substitutes for, like Professor [G.C.] Evans, for whom this building was named, who taught quite a few of the courses in the programs that we took. We are going to have that same trouble again, I am sure.

In September, he had to go to international meetings of some sort. So then someone would come and teach his course for a couple of times while he was gone. One time Professor [Pauline] Sperry did and one time Professor [Sophia] Levy did. These were the two women professors in the Mathematics Department. When Professor John Macdonald retired, Miss Levy became Mrs. Macdonald, but not before because of nepotism regulations.

It was through Miss Sperry that I first went to the Women's Faculty Club. She was active in the Women's Faculty Club. I didn't know [about] it at the time. She gathered together several women graduate students in the physical sciences and invited us to lunch. She took us over there and encouraged us to join. For graduate students at that time, it would certainly cost very little. It was 50¢ in those days, as I recall.

Riess: What year was that?

Scott: Oh that must have been 1941 or 1942. It was already during the war.

2) Mathematics and Astronomy Departments, Berkeley

Riess: Wartime. That is traditionally the time when the strength of women on campus is greatest.

Scott: On the contrary, it was not at all like that. I was a teaching assistant, but I don't think it had anything to do with the war. Then I stopped being a teaching assistant. I was teaching astronomy.

Scott: I started being a research assistant on this war project that [Jerzy] Neyman had and I couldn't do them both at once. Then occasionally I would go and be a lecturer in mathematics. I would change back and forth.

Riess: That was when the statistics was just the Statistical Laboratory?

Scott: Well, you see, the Statistics Department didn't exist at that time. It was part of the Mathematics Department. It had quite a little autonomy, in teaching and in appointments, and it was actually on the line budget; the Statistical Laboratory showed on the budget.

Neyman prepared that part of the budget and the courses and so forth. Although it wasn't a separate department, it had almost all the autonomy of a separate department, but that was something that he fought for.

Riess: I thought it was an accepted tenet that when war comes, men go to war and women are offered more tenured positions.

Scott: No, you didn't see that happening here nor in any other prestigious university. There were some professors who went away. That's true: [Charles B. Morrey, for example, and others. Some professor did go away to work in Aberdeen or someplace like that.] But, that did not mean that women were appointed except as occasional lecturers. There were few women students.

Oh, there was one assistant professor, Ann Davis, but it was just very unusual to have women students here. Julia Robinson was a student. Very, very few.

Riess: Now you are talking in mathematics.

Scott: In mathematics. In astronomy there were a few more, but still very few.

Riess: Is astronomy a sort of sister to mathematics?

Scott: Well, the proportion of women has always been higher in graduate astronomy than in mathematics.

In those days there was another problem. At that time women were not allowed to use the Mount Wilson telescopes, the big telescopes in California. It was just forbidden. That went on for many years.

Riess: Forbidden!

Scott: Well, it is not too often that you can actually put your finger on a discrimination and you know that you really can prove that it was there. That was actually a well known fact. There was no secret about it. Women were not allowed to use the big telescopes at Mt. Wilson, the 60-inch and 100-inch.

Women were not on the staff. There are no women on the staff at the Mount Wilson and Palomar Observatories (the Hale Observatories, we call them now) at the present time. Only as assistants, not as staff members, not as astronomers.

Riess: How about Lick?

Scott: Lick was different, there was no problem at Lick Observatory. I was encouraged to go up there. I actually spent several summers at Lick Observatory. No problem at all. [C. Donald] Shane, who was chairman at Berkeley at that time, encouraged me always. He arranged for me to spend a summer at Mount Wilson Observatory in Pasadena assisting. But I wasn't allowed to use a telescope. Other students who spent the summer there got to assist at the telescope but not me.

Well, that is just the way it was. There were quite a few women there who were assistants. They were called computers. We would now call them maybe programmers or something like that. Each one of them told me that I was really making a mistake trying to get a Ph.D. in astronomy, because if I had a Ph.D. then they would say that I was overqualified to work in astronomy. I wouldn't be able to get a job in astronomy and I think that was really quite true.

Riess: Was this an issue, then, that people were fighting? And you yourself?

Scott: No, I never heard anything of resistance and I didn't. I felt that one "can't fight city hall." I just did whatever I could do. I could go there and see what happened and do many things but not everything. People were very nice to me but I didn't get to use the telescope. I didn't get invited to the luncheons and so forth. I was just treated differently.

3) Luncheon Groups at the Women's Faculty Club

Riess: When Pauline Sperry invited you to join the Women's Faculty Club, or come to the meetings, how did she present it?

Scott: Oh, she took us to lunch first just so we could see what it was like. She asked us if we would be interested in doing that. I don't know whether everybody said yes. That was my impression--there was general agreement--that we could eat there, both lunch and dinner. We rarely did eat there although at that time there were a lot fewer places to eat than there are now.

Riess: It was a lunch club, that was all?

Scott: No, she also said there are other activities going on. Actually, at that particular time there weren't many other activities going on. There were annual dinners and things like that. There weren't luncheon meetings of other sorts, which had happened earlier in the 1920s as I saw from the old minutes, and actually Josephine Smith talked to me about it too.

There used to be regular kinds of meetings where people presented academic papers to get experience and criticism of these papers, discussion about them before they presented them in other places around, or at the same time they present them at other places. Anyway, to support each other. Actually, there were more women faculty proportionately in the early 1920s than there were later.

Riess: Yes, interesting, isn't it?

Josephine Miles talks about a group of twelve women that had that kind of lunch and sharing of research papers in the 1940s or 1950s.

Scott: No, that I didn't even know about. I knew about this earlier one in the 1920s but that would be before she came here. You know, it was her idea to start it again here. When did we first start? Maybe three years ago or four years ago. We really worked hard at it. What happens is that only what you might call old-timers come. The new people for whom we really had it in mind, thinking that we are helping, don't come. So, they certainly aren't getting any help. I am not quite clear whether it would be helpful or not, but they don't turn up.

The reason partly is, and I have the same trouble myself, you get lots of classes and lots of meetings at noon time. You just get loaded up at noon time. I don't think that is the only reason. Once they get into trouble, like their promotion doesn't go through, then they come with some enthusiasm. By that time it is really hard to do anything in order to help them.

Riess: So you are describing more a support group than sharing research.

Scott: Well, we didn't want it to be just a support group. We were trying for academic interaction. We didn't want to think of it as a support group, indeed, quite a few people felt there was enough of those support groups already.

Riess: The 1960s, yes, but now?

Scott: They exist but they are very inactive. So we really ought to have something where the Women's Faculty Club would be doing something for women faculty, getting them the chance to participate on some kind of academic endeavors. They just don't seem to really be interested. I don't know what to do about it. Right now we are about ready to throw in the towel. We might as well meet and have lunch after all, instead of trying to get a response.

Another problem that has always been with us is the number of faculty in the club. There are not very many women faculty anyway, so they couldn't have a club all by themselves. They need to have other people there. I am in favor of having other women there. I think that is just fine. But when I first came in, I always had the impression it was being run by the librarians. I mean, one probably had different impressions at different times. It depends on who is in charge at any particular time. It just seemed as if they were running everything.

In particular, I came into a huge disagreement. There was another woman statistician at that time, Evelyn Fix. She since died. But, we nominated a woman who was working actually in the Radiation Lab, but also on the campus--maybe she was in Donner Lab, I don't remember the details--but with a Ph.D., and publishing papers, and so forth, to be a member of the Women's Faculty Club. Before I did it, I asked her if she would be interested and she said yes.

Then, to my horror, she was turned down because she wasn't a member of the faculty. I really got very unhappy about that because women researchers were, I thought, just as good if not better than women secretaries or women librarians. I just couldn't see why she was turned down. There was just some trivial interpretation of the by-laws. It didn't mention the word researchers, and I was just really unhappy about that.

So, I said, and Evelyn also said, I think several of us said, "If she is not admitted we're going to resign." We came to a real impasse over that. I was just amazed that this was happening there. So they changed their opinion after some months and agreed to admit her. She died six months later. That was a really unfortunate kind of situation.

Riess: When was this?

Scott: It must have been the late 1940s. I don't remember that now.

Riess: That's a period in the club that's described as sluggish.

Scott: Nothing much was happening. They weren't making extensive efforts to get new members or anything like that. Actually, this woman also was the wife of a member of our department, Stefan Peters, who was teaching actuarial science and statistics in those days.

Riess: When Pauline Sperry approached Josephine Miles to join the club, she said, "You owe it to women to do this."

Scott: It may be that she told us that too. It could be, it would be just like here.

Riess: Was she a real feminist?

Scott: Not to an extreme, but to a certain extent, yes. She was not an outstanding mathematician. You know, adequate. She was a quiet and pleasant person.

Riess: You weren't being beaten down in your own department so that you would find a refuge in the Women's Faculty Club?

Scott: Well, no, I certainly wasn't thinking about that. My departments were quite supportive. I certainly had problems. I am sure that other women must have felt that too. But it didn't occur to me that the Women's Faculty Club would help me with these problems, let's put it that way. And it didn't.

The most supportive person for us was Neyman, for Evelyn Fix and myself and the other women who have been in this department. I think it just was his personality. Not very many outstanding statisticians would ever have women students, or a woman appointment. He was just very unusual in that respect.

Riess: Were there any other places that you would get together with women?

Scott: Oh, yes, but we did not meet as women; we met as students and then as junior faculty. The atmosphere was friendly.

Riess: What was your living arrangement?

Scott: I lived at home. I still do so that hasn't changed at all. It is still the same place. The only time I didn't would be when I went to Lick Observatory or went to Stanford or something like that; or on a sabbatical.

4) The Women's Faculty Club in the 1960s

Riess: It looks like the Women's Faculty Club dealt with the merger issue from 1966 to 1976.

Scott: I don't know when it first came up. I just remember that there was a good deal of worry before that time that no one was doing anything. It was just kind of running down. The membership was getting smaller and so forth. I think actually the same thing was happening in the Men's Faculty Club simultaneously. We also knew that people weren't joining there. People who were joining weren't really paying any attention to what was going on.

There were several people who tried to do something about it. One was Doras Briggs. Have you talked to her?

Riess: No, I haven't.

Scott: And Marian Diamond, and several other people were active. It must have been in the early 1960s.

The merger wasn't really under discussion then. It was just to kind of bring the Women's Faculty Club back to life and have it be a viable place. Also to repair all kinds of things which obviously needed repairing: install private bathrooms, you know. It was really getting quite run down. It was already some fifty years old. And looked it.

That was one of the things that people were worried about. There was kind of a slow change. When I first became a member, almost everyone who lived there had lived there for many, many years. That was their home. They acted as if they really were running the place. It was there not exactly for their benefit, but you know what I mean. It was kind of funny. Like, when you would bring a visitor there, there wasn't any staff there to take care of them. So, if Miss May Dornin [resident] hadn't taken care of them, they never would have been able to find their room, where you are supposed to go for breakfast, or the key. We used to get the keys in advance.

It wasn't well organized from the point of view of having visitors come. Visitors clearly wasn't what anybody had intended. It was organized for these permanent people. Some were a little on the quaint side, and it was interesting for the visitors, anyway-- "just like Cambridge."

Riess: It was in a fairly weakened position then.

Scott: I really think so. Then there was this threat to do away with the Women's Faculty Club and enlarge the School of Optometry--to the space the club occupied, just to completely get rid of it. That's the way we heard the story described first, to get the space away from us.

Then, in order to have some place to put these women, "Let them join the Men's Faculty Club." But at that time we weren't even allowed to go in and eat in most of the dining rooms of the Men's Faculty Club. I was physically evicted from there more than once.

Riess: You mean you made the mistake of trying to get in?

Scott: No, I was eating in some room where we had a reservation. For one example—I guess the most striking one--there is a room called the Director's Room that is on the corner. It had a round table. This was some kind of olive association [meeting]. You know, this silly grading that olives are medium, large, blah, blah sizes up to jumbo. Well, they were having some meeting. (I don't know why they thought a statistician would really help them.) Anyway, they were meeting with statisticians to discuss how their sizing could be redone and so forth. (I liked it the way it was before. So I didn't even want to redo it.) But anyway, we hardly made any progress on this luncheon at all when in came a man called Mr. Smith who was a desk, a counter employee. He ordered me to leave. Because I wasn't a member, therefore, I could not be eating in this room, only members were allowed to eat in that room.

I was angry and embarrassed. So I said, "Well, you know that very few people in this room are members. Why do you pick on me?" He said, "Because I can look at you and see that you are not a member. The other people I don't know." (Actually, I think he knew every member very well, but that is detail.) Well, anyway, they all got up and went out. And none of us paid.

You know, that doesn't really help that much. I was really unhappy about the whole thing and it was very embarrassing. Then we had to go somewhere else to get lunch and the whole thing was a big flap.

Riess: But it didn't lead to internal reform at the men's club?

Scott: I protested to Professor Shane the first time that happened to me. He said, "You just shouldn't take it so seriously. You can just say that you could get thrown out of better places." I didn't think that was the right attitude to take. He just didn't attach that much importance to it.

Scott: There had been changes. I think Miss Miles told me that when she first came to Berkeley, you couldn't even enter the building. In the '50s and '60s women could enter certain rooms, but not the whole building. Now, women can join and there are no restrictions.

Anyway, I know that people were trying to get that space. It is not quite clear whether they really could, it may have been a lot of talk. The use of this land was given by the Regents to the women faculty for this purpose. It is not that easy to undo something like that.

There was a plan where they would destroy Senior Men's Hall. Then, "This is an historic building. You can't destroy it."

Riess: What does go on there, incidentally?

Scott: Well, now it is condemned. You see, I don't think it is even sensible to have it condemned, because it is a perfectly good building. The reason I was told, but I don't know whether it is really even true, that it is condemned because there is no running water inside of it. That is a trivial thing to change. I mean it could cost something but it couldn't cost very much. The big argument was whether the foundations were good. Anyway, it is just not used at all now. I think it is really wasteful. It would be a nice place to have for meetings. They used to have senior men actually meet there. Then they were having folk dancing which was popular at the time. There were some complaints from the Men's Faculty Club that they made too much noise folk dancing. I think they could survive that.

Riess: It makes me wonder just what kind of men really joined the Men's Faculty Club.

Scott: Well, you see, that was the same thing. At that time, almost all of the men who were living in the Men's Faculty Club were old-timers who were living there permanently. That was their home.

Riess: So there was that kind of cranky element. But as far as the club having a real powerful role on campus--the Women's Faculty Club was sluggish, how about the men's?

Scott: I think it also was to a large extent. There are certain people who meet there and it is still true today. There are certain tables where people meet who are known very well to be local politicians in the campus. [Joseph] Hodges, for example, goes to one of these tables every day at eleven o'clock, just like a clock, off he goes. I don't know that they are as important as they think they are--important in local academic politics, running things, getting and making appointments and so forth. Nothing official, entirely unofficial.

5) The Question of Merger

Riess: How were you involved, then, in the club in the 1960s?

Scott: Well, I certainly didn't want to have the club disappear. At first, I heard that it was going to be destroyed. Just at that time, we had already spent the last five years really working hard, raising money and so forth to refurbish it and repair termite damage and the whole bit. So it just seemed a little too much that all of a sudden they are going to tear it all down, after all of this struggle by women faculty and women at University Hall and other women who really spent lots of time and effort doing that. They also started working and getting more people, getting the membership to go back up again. That just seemed to me to be entirely inappropriate. Some members, such as Florence Minard, were active in trying to preserve the club.

Riess: This fundraising was on a women's club level; it wasn't on a grand scale.

Scott: No, no, it was local.

Riess: You didn't feel able to go back to the Regents for funding?

Scott: The Women's Faculty Club never went to the Regents for funding. The Men's Faculty Club did that, but the Women's Faculty Club, I don't know why they didn't do it. It has always been their policy not to borrow money from the Regents. They had a mortgage once, which they financed, and they burned that mortgage and then were entirely clear and entirely independent.

I think they felt that they didn't really need to borrow money, if we increased the rents, which they should have before then, so that the rooms were really paying for themselves, plus a little bit for repair. That was a real cause of trouble, that they didn't have a repair fund. They would be able to just take care of themselves. There were also some gifts from members. Whereas the Men's Faculty Club borrowed a huge amount of money in order to build a bigger wing and to refurbish the parts that they had before. They have trouble with interest payments and were not repaying the loan.

Riess: Well, I know, I certainly have some thoughts about how that is just typical of the way men would deal with money and the way women would deal with money.

Scott: Yes, it may well be true. When the money was given by Levi Strauss, in honor of [Roger] Heyns and in honor of [Clark] Kerr, the donor had the idea that the two clubs would join and that they would admit not only faculty, but faculty wives and other persons. He had a lot of changes which he had in mind that were supposed to take place. I don't know how enthusiastic everybody was about this, but I don't think there was any objection to having more faculty and more faculty wives belong to the Women's Faculty. I don't think that was a real problem.

The problem was, should we or should we not join with the Men's Faculty Club? There were several things, one of them we just finished mentioning. This was the huge debt that they had. There were a lot of women who were convinced that once you joined the two clubs, then you had your share of the debt. If you divide the debt up among the membership, it was an appreciable load for each person to take on, if somebody did the arithmetic. Anyway, this was one of the arguments.

The other argument, used by Laura Nader and quite a few other people, was: look at the way they treated us all these years, why should we have anything to do with them? I think that argument was very telling too. We found out that she also had been tossed out of the Men's Faculty Club more than once. She was more agile than I. She went around, climbed in a window, and came right back in again. [laughter]

Riess: Had she been active in the women's club?

Scott: Not that I noticed. I think everyone is very busy. I have not been active in it either. I am very busy.

Riess: Well, you got your name at the end of various petitions and onto various committees.

Scott: Well, that is true, and then for a while I was a member of the board. I worked and I really did my share. But I probably did less than any other board member.

Riess: Was this when Peg Uridge was the president?

Scott: She was a very good and a very active president and really worked in bringing the club up. She really worked hard on trying to arrange this merger. For a while we had joint bookkeeping and their bookkeeping was so awful. You never got a correct bill.

At that time, the manager that they had was very inefficient and obnoxious. It wasn't a propitious time to have a merger. If they asked today, I think people would be more willing.

Riess: Well, I think that if men and women merge in such a situation the women would end up sort of bailing the club out.

Scott: That is what many people claim. We tried very hard to get some way of voting that, at least as far as the property was concerned, would be fair, and that was not agreeable. Anyway, eventually, the Women's Faculty Club voted against the merger and therefore the Men's Faculty Club didn't even vote. I have a very strong hunch that they would have voted against the merger too. I don't know, but just from the people that I talk to.

Riess: Josephine Miles said that you called her in to fight the merger and you halted the momentum of the merger, and you went in and bucked up this exhausted board that had no sense any longer of direction to take.

Scott: I certainly didn't stage a big fight against the merger but I wanted a fair merger. I said I just didn't know which way I wanted. I was in favor of merger for some reasons--if it would save the Women's Faculty Club, I thought the club should be saved, the clubhouse should be saved. But if it would destroy the integrity, then no. I spoke in both ways.

Riess: You were on a committee that included some of the die-hard anti-merger people.

Scott: That's right but that was near the end of this period. As time went on, more and more people were opposed, and they started lining themselves up. I was on a committee concerned with this, especially at the end, as time went on, and especially when I saw the voting plan under the merger: the way they were going to have the voting, and that they were going to charge very high initiation fees which would go only towards retiring the debt of the Men's Faculty Club, and that they were going to charge very high dues, even to younger people--then I was just completely opposed because we never would get any women faculty because nobody can afford it, and who would want to pay a big initiation fee to bail out the Men's Faculty Club. It doesn't make sense.

Riess: Sounds like a hard thing was to make a strong argument for the Women's Faculty Club.

Scott: No. We had good support. At first, it was very curious. This money that was given was given in two pieces: I think maybe they got some and then asked for some more and got some more. Anyway, it came in two pieces. The first part, that was split between the Men's Faculty Club and the Women's Faculty Club. It was supposed to be used on the buildings.

Scott: It was split in proportion to the membership, so the Women's Faculty Club got little. We used the part that we got to put in those fire sprinklers. (Somebody from California Hall said that that is what we have to use it for; for something like our clubhouse, sprinklers are now mandated, and that we are not living up to code.) We agreed it would be important for safety. There was a lot of discussion about how to put them in so they wouldn't be too conspicuous. I think they did reasonably well. They certainly are not beautiful, but anyway. So that was put in. Then the other part of the money went for some termite work in some other part, a lot of which was also paid by the Women's Faculty Club itself.

Then all of a sudden somebody in the legal part of California Hall--I think Pete Smith--decided that that was illegal, that none of the money should go to the Women's Faculty Club, because it was supposed to go to a merger and therefore should go to the Men's Faculty Club. We were really angry when that happened. We really made a fight about that. I mean that's outrageous, an arbitrary decision. Eventually, they paid all the bills for the changes. Rumor had it, but I really don't know what really happened, that the donor's money all did go to the Men's Faculty Club, and the money that paid this bill for doing the change-over in the Women's Faculty Club came from some other funds. I don't know whether that is a true story or not. I just really don't know, but that's what I kept hearing.

Riess: When you say, "We got really angry," who is the "we" at this point?

Scott: Well, it probably was Josephine Miles and Peg Uridge and myself, but also the members. I think everybody in the Women's Faculty Club who was aware of the problem. Most people probably never even heard it.

6) The Women's Center

Riess: I wondered whether, at least, all of this activity had the effect of bringing you all somewhat closer together, or that it did something for the club itself.

Scott: Well, there is another thing that was going on at the same time which I found very troubling. For some years--I think it was partly through the Prytanean Society, but actually quite a few women were interested in trying to set up what is now the Women's Center on the campus. When that center was first up, it was meeting in the Women's Faculty Club.

Scott: I thought that was really a very good use of the Women's Faculty Club, that they used those downstairs rooms which were empty most of the time. I think they used one or two rooms upstairs which the club could afford to rent for offices. But, it is very interesting. Many women, older members, felt that this was terrible because these people were going to wear out the furniture, they are going to spill food on the rug. You know how people talk. Who cares?

Anyway, they really were hostile. The people in the center couldn't help but feel this hostility. I think it was really unfortunate. So there were these other themes which were going on at the same time. Eventually the center was given space in a temporary building.

Riess: Well, there was the talk about the diapers on the landing.

Scott: I know, how many times did that happen? I don't believe it ever happened to tell you the truth, but you know what I mean. [laughter] This is typical of the way they talk. I just could not get excited about that. But there were plenty of women who talked that way. It is very curious.

Riess: Tell me about Harriet Nicewonger.

Scott: I didn't really know her. I know that she was active in the library and things like that, of the Women's Faculty Club. I didn't really know her.

Riess: How about Emily Huntington?

Scott: Well, Emily Huntington I knew in a different way, you see. When the Statistical Laboratory was first started, so in 1938, she was a professor or associate professor--don't ask me--of economics, the only woman in economics at that time, and she was doing some kind of labor study, cost of living study of women. She came to the department for advice and that is how I first met her. Neyman and I helped her with some of the studies that she was doing, and some other studies that she did later on student housing and so forth. We helped her with that. The Statistical Laboratory had a board of advisors, or whatever the jargon would be, a really unofficial board, but it was useful in discussions with the Mathematics Department. At least part of the time she was a member of this board.

Riess: So you know her through that association.

Scott: That's right. Neyman knew her. Then, I remember that she was already getting older and maybe she was already retired, or almost retired--I don't remember the details--by the time this big thing about the merger was. I don't remember her role in that particularly. It just isn't in my mind.

Riess: But there must have been some women for whom the merger would mean, "At last, a chance to be in the men's club!"

Scott: I didn't notice that. I would say definitely "No."

Riess: Well, Laura Nader?

Scott: No, she had the opposite opinion. She actually spoke in the opposite way, that we just don't want to have anything to do with them after the way they treated us.

Riess: I see, because their record had been so foul.

Scott: Yes. She wasn't the only one, but she spoke very vocally.

Riess: You were on a committee of five to prepare a proposal to combine using the men's as the main clubhouse and the women's for multi-use, including Prytanean. Also on this committee was Peg Uridge and Katharine Stauffer, Mary Ann Johnson, Ruth Donnelly.

Scott: Ruth Donnelly was very active. Yes, I remember, very much so.

Riess: You worked out a proposal in June 19, 1971. Then, the next year there was a brand new committee of five, Dorothy Randolph, Martha Stumpf, Collette Seiple, Roberta Park. This ousting of the old committee of five, did this mean anything?

Scott: No, I think this just shows that there wasn't general agreement about what should be done with the Women's Faculty Club. I probably got appointed when one thing should be done. I could see having this women's center there. I certainly was in a minority on that. Many of the women were in favor of having a women's center there, but not all by any matter of means. I was shocked at how many were really opposed to having a women's center there.

Riess: I suppose the residents were opposed.

Scott: Residents were opposed. They weren't the only ones. Somehow or other, this business that you might hurt the furniture, you might hurt the rugs, you might spill something--I was just shocked by that.

Riess: It wasn't that these women were younger and more issue-oriented.

Scott: That wasn't brought up, and that was what really bothered me. If that was the real cause of trouble, I wouldn't have objected so much. It was just property oriented. I thought that was disgraceful.

7) Club Organization

Riess: Josephine Miles describes the board meetings, the ad hominem arguments, and always the detail, detail, detail.

Scott: Yes, the meetings last too long. I am all in agreement with her about that. It is certainly true. I think it is just as true of men's meetings and others. I went to a meeting at the YWCA today, just drove me crazy, and I only stayed there for twenty minutes. You know, you can waste more time on nothing.

Riess: So it takes a very strong woman to kind of override all of that?

Scott: Or to kind of relax through it, so to speak, until you get to something more important to talk about.

Riess: But I mean very strong presidents. Has there ever been faculty member presidents?

Scott: Yes, there have been, but not very often. Marian Diamond was. Who else? I think that the one trouble would be that it is unusual that a woman faculty member has enough time. It takes quite a little time.

It is partly the way it is organized, which changes. We had the managers participate. Now, it is organized in such a way that the manager and the assistant manager are not invited to the meeting, even for a short time. They don't get any directions from the board itself. The president gives them the directions. That takes a lot of time on her part, to supervise those directions, and I think it kind of makes them a whole echelon lower down.

My idea of how to run a club is that although the manager shouldn't be setting the club policy, she ought to really be participating. If you want to change the policy you ought to explain to the manager why and give her a chance to say, "Well, this is not a good change." That is not happening now. I think it is too dictatorial. I think that is the funny thing that happens. Dictatorial in small things. Little tiny things get all blown out of importance.

Riess: There was a suggestion in one of the memos I read that Herma Kay and Natalie Davis and Richard Jennings and Robert Cockrell, would be able to put the women's point of view over to the men. I don't know what that situation might have been. I wondered if that brings anything to mind.

Scott: Well, I don't know exactly what it is talking about, but generally speaking, there would be a certain amount of truth in the following sense: At that time, as I tried to describe to you before, in the merger there was the problem: Who is going to vote? Where is the money going to go? How much money are you going to charge? And so forth. We were just losing out from our point of view on all decisions. I don't even know for sure who was the member of the committee at that time, probably Mrs. Uridge because she was the president. I don't know who else was a member of the committee at that time. I think it was felt that we should have a special committee to go and talk to the Men's Faculty Club board of directors, to make clear exactly what the causes of disagreement were.

Riess: The selection of this group is heavily weighted on the side of the law.

Scott: Well, but Herma Kay is a very persuasive speaker. At that time, and still today, but at that time even more so, she was a leading member of the [Academic] Senate. Natalie Davis was also very persuasive.

Riess: Since men have become members of the women's club--a little current history--do you think that it has given it a new strength?

Scott: Well, you see, something interesting happens that we see, they always try to put--and they explain that to you--at least one faculty member on the board of directors. Usually it is only one. Now they are putting one on, but it is one of the men faculty members. It is kind of like a token. And it keeps happening. You kill two birds with one stone. [laughs] That is the way I felt sitting there, listening to the nominations. I don't care. I didn't say anything. I couldn't help but get this reaction because there is this talk about 17 percent of the members are men, so we need to have a man on the board of directors.

Riess: And what percentage is faculty? If 17 percent are men?

Scott: I don't know, probably 17 percent, probably. It is not many, that is for sure. I really don't know, and I expect no one knows.

Riess: When you say "they" tried to put, aren't they elected?

Scott: But the nominating committee is somewhat circular in the sense that there is just one name for each vacancy. Well, you could nominate other people, that is for sure--but no one ever does. The nominating committee is appointed by the board, but pretty much by the president.

Riess: I think that if there is only one faculty member on the board, why that is a real sad state of affairs.

Scott: Well, there is no such law, don't misunderstand me. I think it is almost the other way around, that it is not easy to find people who want to serve on the board of directors because it takes time and energy. They probably don't think it is all that important.

Riess: The group that lunches and talks about women's problems and so on, and so on; Susan Ervin-Tripp, is that what you were referring to?

Scott: Yes, she is one of the people who participates in it very strongly. And she arranges other meetings in the club with young women faculty. Invites them to lunch with her.

Riess: So it does exist now, this group?

Scott: Yes. But I think this year it has only met--I was out of town when it met--I think it only met once in the fall. Earlier we used to try to meet once a month. We are trying to meet once a quarter. I don't know, we should call them and find out. I think the person who is organizing it right this minute is Helen Eckert of physical education.

Riess: It is only faculty?

Scott: Well, some non-faculty administrators are encouraged to come. But the aim was at faculty, especially at young faculty. I think it is petering out.

Additionally there is another ad hoc group, the Association of Academic Women, started earlier. When this group was putting pressure on to have more women appointed, and more women graduate students and so forth, it was very active. Now, even though people feel that not all of our problems are solved, we only meet when there is something coming up, or there is something that we would want to form a committee and go and talk to the chancellor about, or whatever the case may be.

Riess: The association, is that something with branches on other campuses?

Scott: No, it is a completely local ad hoc group. There are similar groups though. I don't think they even collected any dues for two or three years. That will tell you how inactive it is.

Riess: If you had to fight the fight to keep the Women's Faculty Club intact again, would you?

Scott: Oh I think so, yes. Well, you see, again, I am still of two minds because when people in other universities hear that we have a women's faculty club, and a men's faculty club, they think that is ridiculous. I agree. They don't have that. In other universities women could enter various rooms in the faculty clubhouse if they used the back door or some such. I have done that in the past at Harvard, at Chicago.

But that shows that things were even worse at Berkeley. Women were not allowed to enter The Faculty Club fifty or sixty years ago by any door. So they were essentially forced to form their own club. I think it is an unusual situation, and just kind of left over from that unusual situation. It doesn't mean that it should be maintained forever. Probably the system that we have now, that men can join the women's and women can join the men's, gets around this big inequity in dues problem. That is probably the main reason that you have so many men joining the Women's Faculty Club. It is much, much cheaper.

Riess: I guess the issue is anything but totally dead.

Scott: Well, I think that is okay, you know. Right now, at least, we say the food is better and I think that is probably still true.

1) Women's Faculty Club Board

Riess: A look in the Women's Faculty Club files shows me that when you were on the board you worked very, very hard at fund-raising projects. Would you recall for me some of those undertakings, and which of them were most successful?

Diamond: We had a marvelous time with our fund-raising projects and raised about $32,000 in all. Doras Briggs was a real assistant through out. Many helped. It was a very social, cooperative effort. We had foreign dinners, a cocktail party on the bay, and many very enjoyable events, which proved most successful. The dining room, before our efforts, was a dull, mossy green where few came. The new room is as lovely, lively a luncheon room as we could find anywhere.

[question off tape about talk of merger of the men's and women's faculty clubs] I think everybody was interested in evaluating a merger, but whether they were supporting it, I can't say. During our time we felt very good because we [Women's Faculty Club] were operating in the black and they [The Faculty Club] were operating in the red. There weren't many benefits to be gained for us by merging at that time. But without money you can't run the club. When you're operating the club in the red, you're very self-conscious about your abilities. [laughs] The money aspect is a very realistic aspect, because the social, the academic and the intellectual aspects we can get elsewhere.

2) Lunch Groups

Riess: It's interesting that you say you could get the intellectual and social aspects of being with your peers elsewhere.

Diamond: You could with the men, if you wanted to, in your departments, you know; if you make that effort, it was available there. But you didn't know where the other women were on campus. And the only place you were going to know that was through the Women's Faculty Club.

Riess: What about the many women faculty who don't join?

Diamond: I really don't know. Some of us are just more social than others. Four or five years ago I did organize at the club what we called Ben's Forum, twelve senior women professors, and we meet once a quarter, and I like very much to meet with those women. I feel I'm touching base with them and I am finding out what they are doing in their disciplines, whether it is chemistry or astronomy or psychology or whatever. I find that is extremely satisfying, from a basic academic woman's point of view.

Riess: I've been looking for evidence of something like that in the club.

Diamond: I did it myself. I just picked women out there that I admired. I didn't know them. Elizabeth Scott, Susan Ervin-Tripp, Bobbie [Babette] Barton, Phyllis Blair. We didn't have anyone in physics so I went to Hayward State and asked Ann Birge--you know, Birge Hall, the granddaughter, I guess, of Professor [Raymond T.] Birge. We didn't have anybody in business, so I got Sarah Staubus who is a professor at Hayward State. Two very fine women, with families. People I admired. Josephine Miles was another. I've got the whole list here in my book but I'm just naming off some of these twelve outstanding women.

So we meet once a quarter and we go around the table and sort of say what's new with us and what's bothering us at the present time, and you get an insight into common problems that we each face, whether they are personal or professional. And I really love it. We talk about having socials in the evening, but we only had one--they all came to my house one night, with spouses or friends, for a potluck. I like the feeling that they are all out there, even though I don't see them.

Riess: It's unaffiliated, even though you use the Women's Faculty Club for your lunches?

Diamond: We did, until they gave us a difficulty with trying to get a room once. They had a conflict. So then I moved over into the men's club, because I was on their board then. So, would you believe, we're meeting at the men's club at the present time. They like the executive room in the men's club, the one Chancellor Bowker had designed for $32,000 for him to entertain his VIPs. And since I'm on the board they let me use that for the ladies. It's interesting the way we play back and forth. [laughter]

Riess: Was there any reason to think you couldn't have continued to meet at the women's club?

Diamond: We could have gone back. It was just that that time it was awkward.

Riess: But is there an awkwardness of having an ingroup within the group?

Diamond: No, I think that's marvelous.

Then from what we established, Elizabeth Scott thought, "Let's go back to having a women's faculty meeting maybe once a month and having each faculty member speak about her profession." So, we'd meet for lunch for the first half-hour and the second half-hour we'd talk about what was new in our fields. That was very nice, and that wasn't restricted--that was any women faculty member who wanted to join.

Ben's Forum consisted of twelve, because Benjamin Franklin had twelve men that he met with just to discuss issues of interest to the group.

Riess: Do they all appear regularly?

Diamond: Actually, the only time that everyone came was when President [David] Saxon wanted to meet Ben's Forum. I thought that was precious! Every single lady showed up for that, all twelve. But Herma Kay doesn't show up on a regular basis. I send her invitations because I'd like to know her better, but she obviously is busy with other things. And a few--Marian Koshland just definitely said she wasn't interested. She evidently didn't have that sort of need to meet with other women faculty members. She dropped immediately.

Riess: Elizabeth Scott's group meets in the club?

Diamond: Right. In the board room. There again--there's a nucleus of women. Margaret Wilkerson, etcetera. I try to make that when I can because I like to hear what other women are doing professionally. I find that exceedingly nice.

3) Faculty Club Funding, Memberships, Parties

Riess: Exceedingly interesting, too, to me. So much of the recorded history of the club is on money matters.

Diamond: It sort of has to be, in a way, to keep the club going. That's what presses us. I didn't go there to worry about how many pats of butter to order, but that's the impression I came away with, that these were important issues. Should we serve pats of butter, or chunks--which was cheaper.

Riess: Do they discuss the pats of butter on the men's club board?

Diamond: They let the manager do that.

The manager was always at our meetings [at the Women's Faculty Club]. What I come away with, remembering, were the little issues we dealt with, but what I liked most about being on that board was that I met Aletha Titmus, I met Bobbie Barton, I met Margaret Thal-Larsen. I really loved working with these groups of intelligent women.

Riess: Do women join the men's club for reasons that have to do with the power of the men on campus?

Diamond: I have no idea, other than that they enjoy men's company on a social basis. We're having more social activities; we're having dances now, and dinners. A big barbeque at the beginning of the year for faculty and their families, held out on the lawn. It's a lovely social aspect that the [men's] club didn't have before.

Riess: Has the Women's Faculty Club over the years taken political stands as a board on issues on campus?

Diamond: No, I don't believe so.

Riess: Has the men's?

Diamond: No. Again, as I look at our job, it's raising money, improving the club physically and socially. We spend most of our time with those issues, and our management. And the management will bring the problems of salaries and so forth, and so we discuss all of this.

I think we join the faculty clubs because it gives us a chance to deal with all the people throughout the campus on a more relaxed basis. And though we spend our time talking about funding and things like this--just as we write grants when we are in the departments--it's a different level at which you approach it, and with a different emphasis. It's a much more relaxed emphasis. And it's fun to be active [on the board]; you really get to know the people that way. You take our board--we've got a former dean of the Business School, a vice chancellor of finance, the former dean of the School of Social Welfare. These are very substantive directive fine human beings, and to sit there and argue about various issues of the club is pure delight.

Riess: People like Josephine Smith on the Women's Faculty Club board.

Diamond: Yes, I wouldn't have met her otherwise, and I loved her clear, sharp twinkling eyes as she would work. I can see her spreading everything out and following it, the black line versus the red line, you know, how we're moving along.

Riess: Does the composition of the board of the Women's Faculty Club reflect the membership?

Diamond: I think it does. Mary Lou Norrie was on the board, and she was faculty. So there were about five of us, and about five that weren't.

Riess: But considering the fact that the great number of members are from the nonacademic side?

Diamond: Then obviously they went overboard to try to get more faculty to make it look equal on the board as far as campus representation was concerned.

Riess: The Men's Faculty Club is also for non-academics?

Diamond: Yes, let me just think on the board. Yes, there are a few there who are not academicians. But I think mention is made of this, that they don't feel there is enough of a meshing between administration and faculty. We do have membership cocktail parties where everybody is invited, but it's true that when I go it seems to me that there are more administrative than faculty members there. I don't know offhand the ratio for membership in the men's club.

We've also had associate memberships, for people who work for the Bancroft Library or for the Art Museum or for the Lawrence Hall of Science, who dedicate their efforts for the university, to get them associate memberships. We wrote to their presidents to ask them to submit names to us of people that we could then invite to increase our membership. And we've had a membership drive to bring in people in the community--we don't want it to be opened to the community, but leaders in the community--so the Chamber of Commerce has sent us a list of outstanding people. Our membership drive tried to bring those people in, and we had a luncheon for them. This was my function. So I sat next to the president of the Bank of America [laughing] or wherever, from the city, and they were very pleased to be brought in, to know that they could bring their guests to the Men's Faculty Club for lunch.

What we used to do in the women's club for associate members, we would just tap outstanding women in the community, one or two, but we never had a real drive to bring in outstanding women.

Riess: This all reflects the need to have more dues coming in?

Diamond: Right. And interests, and to make the club more alive, more meaningful to the university and the community.

When it comes to the Christmas party, this is when you see everybody. Last year we had three hundred at the Christmas party, and had to turn away that many. So this year we're going to have two nights of the Christmas party. I fought hard for that. Our board said, "No, only one night, because it was the Christmas party," and I said, "Let's ask the membership." So we sent it out to the membership and it turned out that about three hundred to fifteen wanted two nights so that everybody could come. So I feel very good. We had a little running feud on that one! [laughter]

Riess: Why is it such a wonderful party?

Diamond: Because it's the one time of year when everybody really gets together, sings together, relaxes together, and it starts the whole Christmas spirit. [phone interruption]

The Monks sing--faculty and administration dressed in robes, men with gorgeous voices who volunteer. It's become a tradition. They walk among the tables singing their carols, which is always a delight.

Then we have a Christmas skit, and this is written by one of the deans of the Law School, Jim Hill. Sometimes Professor [James] Cahill will write it. They rotate around, those who like to write skits. And over the years six of us have been in it; even though some of us cannot sing at all, we still participate. The skit deals with an issue that's current and becomes a very good musical.

Then we all sing Christmas carols at the end. It's just the one time that the faculty gets together in a relaxed fashion on this whole campus for the whole year! [phone interruption]

Riess: And the Women's Faculty Club is invited?

Diamond: [going to the phone] They're invited, yes.

4) The Question of Where to Have Lunch

Riess: Is there any way in which belonging to the Women's Faculty Club has actually advanced your career here at the university?

Diamond: I've never looked on it that way. I'm not one who's out for advancement. I work because I love to teach and I love to do my research and I like to work with people. I only work to advance myself if I feel it's unfair. And there have been occasionally times when it's been unfair, and then I've gone in fighting. But no, I went there because I want to interact with people and see what they're thinking, find out what the other women's problems are and what the benefits are, both academic and social. I like to go to their luncheons where you learn about their fields. I like to hear about what Elizabeth Scott's doing, or what Hanna Pitkin in political science is doing. I admire Hanna, and I see her from afar, and I read about her and I want to go and listen to her. I go for that reason.

Riess: I must say it sounds like that wasn't just automatically a part of the club, that it took some pushing, some structure.

Diamond: I think so, very definitely. I didn't just call up women and have lunch with them up there, because I like the group effort and the interaction, it's a little more dynamic--in some ways restrictive, but I think we all feel good when we leave. And we use the women's club for it.

Riess: And you think the clubs should be separate?

Diamond: Yes. I like having the two, and I like some days, if I'm taking students, to be able to say, "Where do you want to go? Men's or women's club?" And I tell them the virtues of each and they can choose, because every week I take students to lunch.

Riess: Pretend I'm a student. What are the virtues of each?

Diamond: What are the virtues of each? Well, you have better salads at the women's club, and I like eating outside. And they treat you in a more feminine fashion; it's more a ladies club. The men's club is rugged and you feel the history, the dynamics of intellectualism of these men come through the walls. This dark, uncarpeted in some areas, place. You feel tradition more in the men's.

The women's is more airy, lighter, and beautiful. Its antiques are lovely. I love to show people the quality. I feel elevated in spirit by going into the women's club and I don't necessarily feel elevated going into the men's. I feel more traditional and more academic.

Riess: And if you were taking a visitor from Harvard?

Diamond: Again I'd ask them, and see what they would say. I always give them a choice. I like sort of going into the men's for lunch and telling them that women were not allowed in the Great Hall. "Let's go eat in the Great Hall, because we weren't allowed in here previously." And I like telling them how when I first went in that club the men used to say, "What are you doing here?!" And now that I'm vice president of their club, it's a good feeling. I feel I've come a long way in acceptance--or maybe it's just age. Whatever it is, I feel comfortable in both clubs.

Riess: So you would say that one of the effective aspects of the merger talk was to bring the two clubs together.

Diamond: To discuss whether they should really exist. There are those who feel they should [merge], for food reasons or whatever, for economic reasons. But I still think it's kind of fun sometimes to just feel like you're going to eat at a women's club. They are mixed now, but you still have that background feeling that this is for women.

Riess: When were women first allowed in the Great Hall?

Diamond: In that merger period. And you still don't sit at the two round tables at the entrance. Those are sacrosanct, there's no doubt about it. I haven't been invited to sit there yet. One of these days I'll ask Michael Goodman if he will let me sit at the head round table where "The Professors" sit.

Riess: Michael Goodman is a very long-standing member. Are there young bloods--

Diamond: Who sit at that table?

Riess: In general, at the men's club?

Diamond: They don't have as many junior members as they would like. This is something we'd like to include. But again, you're not going to get the assistant professors joining the men's club, except for those who want to promote their careers or think they might by that route. Most of them are staying home in their departments and working very hard to be sure they become members of the faculty and get a tenured position. So I think that's the rationale for why we don't have so many junior members. Once they know they're going to be here a while, then they begin to look outside their departments for other associations. I think it's a very reasonable approach.

5) Administrative Interests

Diamond: I wouldn't spend that much time as a junior faculty--I did though, however. It's interesting. I'm contradicting myself. Because I also wanted to see other women. But I'm a social character. Promoting my career isn't that important.

Riess: You were junior faculty then?

Diamond: I was junior faculty when I became a dean, and they said, "You have to realize that this doesn't mean you're going to be permanent faculty, just because you've come into the dean's office." I started as assistant dean in the College of Letters and Sciences and worked up to associate dean from about 1967 to 1972. In fact my time then was very much involved with administration and I dropped my association with the Women's Faculty Club at that time; I got off the board.

It's interesting, most people wouldn't want to be a dean, but I wanted to really work in advising. I disliked our negative attitudes towards advising in this university. I thought I could get in there and make advising an important part of a faculty career. And eventually advising is on the faculty biographical form now, how much time you spend with research, teaching, and how much time you spend advising. So I think by making a little noise we brought it along; it served a purpose. You spend an awful lot of time talking to students when you're not out teaching. But you're helping them.

I feel good in that respect, that I'm not saying all professors spend a lot of time with it, but at least they have to designate how much time they do spend. And those who do spend a lot, now will get more credit. Not as much as for teaching and research, but at least some acknowledgment that you do spend time trying to help students find their way around this big university.

Riess: Are committee meetings of faculty ordinarily held at the clubs?

Diamond: They frequently meet at The Faculty Club for lunch. It depends on the committee, and how long a period you have to work. Short committees very definitely have met at the men's, primarily, because they have more rooms available. They're going to open up their whole recreation room now, and it will no longer be a recreation room, it will be a committee room. I fought that one too. [laughter] I lost there.

Riess: You sound like a good fighter.

Diamond: Well, what's the purpose of having the brain to give you new ideas, if you don't try to use them?

1) The Academic and the Non-Academic Sides of the Club

Riess: A little bit about you--how long have you been on this campus?

Johnson: You mean my professional background? Well, I started in the purchasing department in January of 1938, and I stayed in that department (it had some changes of names through the years). I retired in 1977 as the assistant university materiel manager.

I was always involved with all the campuses, not just Berkeley. First we called them statewide, then university-wide and then Office of the President. Finally they were calling it systemwide administration and it was still that when I retired in August of 1977.

Riess: Are you a graduate of the university?

Johnson: Yes, I graduated in 1937 in economics and then I went to business college. I came back in January of 1938 as a clerk in the purchasing department. Women, even though they had the education, weren't being given the jobs that men with comparable education were given. However, this was also still in the Depression days, so I felt I was quite lucky to have a job. It was, through the years, a very enjoyable experience. I love the place.

Riess: That's a good introduction.

Were you aware at the time, 1938, of the Women's Faculty Club?

Johnson: Well, not in the beginning. I did join in 1947, and that was on the invitation of Vera May Twist, who was the administrative assistant in the School of Business Administration, and a long-time member of the club.

Riess: As a female employee on campus, what were your meeting places with other women?

Johnson: Well, mainly the restaurants down on the avenue. When I came, Sproul Hall hadn't been built, the Student Union hadn't been built, and that block between Bancroft and Sather Gate was all businesses and restaurants. And one of the favorite restaurants and meeting places was the Black Sheep, which later moved over onto Bancroft Way. Another was The Varsity on the corner of Bancroft and Telegraph.

Riess: The Black Sheep must have been packed, because everybody says it was the best.

Johnson: Oh yes, she had marvelous food. So that was the main gathering place at that time. There really wasn't a restaurant on the campus that I can remember.

Riess: Were there social hierarchies among the groups of women that got together for lunch?

Johnson: Oh, I don't think so, not that I was really aware of. It would be mainly the people who were working first in California Hall, which is where I started, and then in Sproul Hall. The women in the academic departments, I think, according to the building they were working in, that's where they found their friends. While I knew a number of people through telephone contacts, they were just a voice to me. So there really wasn't a lot of mixing. I had a few friends up at the rad lab who would come down to the Black Sheep and we would have lunch together. But I didn't have access to the Women's Faculty Club until 1947, when I became a member.

Emily Huntington was the secretary at that time and she's the one who signed my membership card, which I looked at just recently. Emily just passed away.

Riess: She was in economics also.

Johnson: Yes, although I hadn't had her as a professor when I was a student.

Riess: Was that the usual experience, that one was invited to be a member of the club rather than initiating it on your own?

Johnson: At that time, yes. They had some strict criteria as far as the staff people who were eligible to become members. You had to be a certain level--I think administrative assistant at that time. Since then they have lowered that to what used to be called principal clerk or secretary; I'm not sure what the titles are now.

Riess: I saw, just this morning, that in the early '60s the Board of Directors was not only named, but titled. "So and so, Placement Officer III," and I thought that was interesting.

Johnson: Yes, that is. If I was aware of it, I've forgotten it.

Riess: I should think there would be an effort, once people were in the club, to consider everyone to be equal.

Johnson: Uh, no. There was a little difference between the women who were academic people and the non-academic people. And I think that I was one of the first presidents who was not an academic person.

Riess: The "little difference" was perceived by whom?

Johnson: Well, I think by the academic people. Catherine Quire was president at one time [beginning, 1950s], and she had been in the Dean of Students Office. I think she was an assistant professor or associate professor, so she did have academic standing. I can remember her saying when she was president, while she came out of the Dean of Students Office (which was considered non-academic), she had an academic appointment, so that made a little difference to her.

I can't say definitely that there were two classes of members, but generally it was the academic women who were the leaders. And originally, from what I find in the files, the membership was limited to academic women, but it was very soon after that that they opened it up, within a year. They just didn't have that number to draw on.

Riess: If you were a non-academic and the president of the board, you might have a hard time asking a full professor to be in charge of, say, the hospitality committee.

Johnson: Well, I really wasn't aware of that and had no problem getting the cooperation of all the directors on my board.

Riess: There weren't things that were considered to be menial?

Johnson: No, I don't think so, not in that respect. But there was just the feeling that the president of the club should come from the academic side. I don't know, though, about Lucy Ward Stebbins, who was the president for so many years. She was the founder of the club; she was the one who originally took the initiative to get the women together.

Riess: She was a professor of economics.

Johnson: Was she also a professor? I just knew her as dean of women when I was on the campus and then later. She was still living when I joined the club, but she had given up the presidency. But she was president for, oh, twenty-five years I would say, and she really ran the club. Although in looking through the files I see that there were others--Sarah Davis was another great prominent name, and Edith Coulter. I meant to get at those club files and look more stuff up, but I didn't get to it.

I thought I was making headway in that vault, and all of a sudden Katherine Williams called me and said they've pulled out a whole bunch of boxes from a back room and would I come in and help her go through them. So we've been working on the stuff that was just piled up there in that little room off the office. And we still haven't gotten through all of that. Now the things that occurred in the '20s I've put aside to be sure that it isn't something historically important--but all the chits that were signed in the '40s and the payrolls--

Riess: You're hanging onto all of that?

Johnson: No, we're tossing it away. [laughing] Nobody's ever going to look at that and I can't see that it would have any historical benefit.

Riess: Those summary histories in the vault that were done by Sarah Davis and then by Clarus Faubion are just excellent. When I go to the original material, I see the summaries have summarized it very, very adequately.

Johnson: I've tried to save the announcement of each annual meeting. I think that would be of importance to have, and of course the minutes are all there bound. And a copy of the invitation for each one of the special events--and that's frustrating because sometimes it has the day and the month, but not the year!

2) The Board of Directors of the Building Committee, 1954-1967, and the Building Crisis

Riess: So, in 1947 you say you became a member.

Johnson: I served on, oh, I think the library committee, and the hospitality committee. But it was in 1954 that I was elected to the Board of Directors for The Building Committee of the Women's Faculty Club, Inc. I don't know if you know the distinction.

Riess: I know a little about the distinction historically, and I know that that distinction ended in 1966. Let me just back up to the extent of asking whether people just joined the club and didn't take any committee or board role.

Johnson: Oh, yes, there were many, many members who all they wanted to do was to have a place to come and eat and meet their friends and come to the evening functions. They really didn't want to be burdened with working on a committee or on the board.

Riess: And so why did you want to? Can you say?

Johnson: Well, I don't know that I particularly wanted to [laughter], but Vera Christie was on the nominating committee that year. She was quite active in the club and had been a member for many years. I can remember her calling me and asking me if I would stand for election to the board, and I didn't even know what the Building Committee was at that time. I was flattered and accepted, not knowing what I was getting into.

Edith Coulter was treasurer of the Building Committee and the watchdog of the finances. "The Building Committee of the Women's Faculty Club, Incorporated," was the corporation and it was the organization that sold the bonds to raise the money to build the building. It owned the building. The Women's Faculty Club, which was an association, paid rent to the Building Committee, ran the dining room, and rented the rooms and so forth.

The Building Committee was responsible for the building structure. When we had to put a new roof on, it was the Building Committee who had to pay for it. It's only source of funds was the rent that the Women's Faculty Club paid, and there were some pretty bad times when the Women's Faculty Club didn't have enough money to pay the rent.

Riess: You mean bad times over all the years?

Johnson: Over all the years. Going through the records I can see way back in the beginning it was just always a struggle to get enough money to keep going. And when you think of what those women did to get this building built. They couldn't borrow from the bank, because they didn't own the land on which the building was going to be built. It's the Regent's land. So that was why they formed this Building Committee which sold the bonds that raised the money to build the building. I think they were twenty-five year bonds. The bonds were paid off sometime in the late '40s, shortly after I became a member, and they had a big celebration of burning the mortgage.

Johnson: But all of the money that they could get together went to paying off those bonds. And, therefore, the upkeep of the building suffered. Almost the first thing we did after the bonds were paid off was to replace all the mattresses which had been on the beds for twenty-five years.

Riess: It sounds like a possibly very antagonistic situation with the two boards of directors.

Johnson: I don't think so, because it was common membership. If you were a member of the Women's Faculty Club, you were automatically a member of the Building Committee of the Women's Faculty Club. The two organizations had different boards of directors, but they were drawn from the same membership.

Riess: You're defining the Building Committee as the entire body.

Johnson: No, well, I would say the Board of Directors of the Building Committee. And then, in the early times, specifically, Edith Coulter, who was the treasurer.

But there was no way, when the Women's Faculty Club did not have enough money to pay the rent, there was nothing that that Board of Directors of the Building Committee could do to force them to pay the rent [chuckles]. The money just wasn't there. There would be several months when the rent would be waived. But they managed to pay off those bonds and have this house clear.

Then, in 1957, the kitchen was in bad shape, but we got a gift from the Regents of $30,000 to do over the kitchen.

Riess: That was an unsolicited gift?

Johnson: Well, no, we wrote to President Sproul and told him we were in bad trouble. What we wanted in the beginning, what we were asking for, was a loan, but the Regents gave us the money.

And when we finished doing the kitchen over, we had two or three thousand dollars left that we hadn't spent. So we wanted to give it back, and Sproul told us, "No, you keep it and use it some other way "

Riess: [chuckling] Isn't that interesting that the women would want to give it back.

Johnson: We were so conscientious! Now, the men got a big loan from the Regents at one time, but they've had quite a struggle and I understand that all they've been able to do is pay the interest on that loan; they have never paid anything back on the principle.

Johnson: In later years, the Regents did adopt a policy of lending money to the various clubs. When the university was growing and the other campuses were being developed and they were trying to start up faculty clubs on each campus, the Regents did help. Their policy, if I remember correctly, was they would lend one-third and would give one-third and the organization itself would have to raise one-third.

Sometime during the period I was on the board for the Building Committee, we had a struggle with termites. They were in the attic and had come from Senior Men's Hall. They were unusual termites [laughter]; they were the flying kind and that's how they got in the attic instead of the basement. But because they had come from Senior Men's Hall, the Berkeley campus paid for part of the cost to exterminate them.

Riess: Once the mortgage was burned, why did the corporation continue?

Johnson: It was brought up at that time, as I remember, and it was Barbara Armstrong's recommendation that the organization not be changed, that they continue to have the corporation represented by the Building Committee and the association represented by the Women's Faculty Club. I don't know the reason for that recommendation but they went along with that.

Then in 1965 I became president and we started having a fund-raising campaign.

Riess: Well, let's set the scene for your presidency. Gertrude Mitchell had been the president and the records refer to those years, the early '60s, as "years of crisis." Were you still on the board of directors of the corporation?

Johnson: No. I think I left that probably in 1962.

Riess: What was the crisis then?

Johnson: The building was almost falling apart. It needed to be painted inside and out. The rooms were badly run-down. Major plumbing repairs were needed. But there just wasn't the money. The dining room kept running a deficit and the rooms were in such bad shape that we really couldn't charge very much rental per month.

And it was a different kind of living arrangement. Most of the women who were living here had been here for many, many years. It was getting the reputation for being an old ladies home. So the rooms that we did have available for rental were not very attractive from many standpoints. We just weren't generating the money to be able to do the things that needed to be done.

Johnson: Soon after I became president we decided to have a fund-raising campaign and there were many things that we did. The first thing that we did was to raise $12,000 to redo the dining room. The dining room is now pretty much the same shape as when we redid it--back in 1966 or '67.

Riess: The dining room was renovated in the period from January to March in 1967.

Johnson: And you see then, that's when we began to have to work so closely with the Building Committee. We found that actually the two boards were meeting jointly. It became very obvious: "Why do we have these two organizations?"

The other thing that became a concern, the Building Committee being a corporation, the directors were protected more or less from any lawsuit that might be brought if somebody fell, or was otherwise injured. At that time that was becoming a great concern because we were hearing about all these lawsuits that were being brought by people who had been injured in something or other. Well, the directors for the Building Committee were protected because it was a corporation, but the directors and the members of the Women's Faculty Club didn't have that kind of protection, because they were not a corporation. So that was another big reason why we decided that the time had come to have just one organization.

Doras Briggs, who was president of the Building Committee at that time, and myself as president of the Women's Faculty Club, and Bobbie Barton, who was on the board but was also our legal advisor, worked to change the articles of incorporation and the bylaws to put the two organizations together. It had to be voted on by all the members, and I think that was done at the annual meeting in 1967. Then we became one organization. We put the two boards together. Originally there were five on one board and six on the other board and we put them together and had eleven members on one board.

Riess: Was Barbara Armstrong still around?

Johnson: No, she wasn't too active. I think she was still living at that point, but she had retired. Aletha Titmus, who was associate counsel in the General Counsel's Office, was also on our board and she, too, contributed [her expertise]. Aletha later became chairman of the Heyns committee.

Riess: [laughter] You're going too fast; I'm going to have to slow you down. The years under Gertrude Mitchell's presidency, was there any real facing up to problems, or would you say those were stagnant times and that when you came in there was a sense of purpose?

Johnson: They weren't stagnant, but people just didn't have the push to do something. I think I was very fortunate when I became president that there were so many women serving on the board who were such vital people. They had struggled during Gertrude Mitchell's presidency, recognizing the problem, but not really coming to grips with it to try to do anything about it.

We did a lot of things, but in the long run we weren't able to get enough money to do the things that needed to be done with the building. We did raise the $12,000 to redo the dining room, but we had a program--we wanted to raise something like $60,000 so we could get another $120,000, part gift and part loan from the Regents, so we could do the whole building over.

Riess: You had had an estimate from somebody as to the needs and costs?

Johnson: Ken Cardwell was the architect that we had for redoing the dining room. We had some advice from Ken Cardwell as to what should be done, with an estimate of about how much it would cost.

Riess: Did you go to the Regents in search of that money?

Johnson: Not at that time. We needed to first raise $60,000.

Riess: Was that considered?

Johnson: Well, now, yes. We did write a letter to Chancellor Heyns at that time about the needs for the Women's Faculty Club.

Riess: Before 1966 a committee from the board had gone to the chancellor to ask for a dining room subsidy, and this had led to the appointment of the ad hoc committee. So that must have been the time when Heyns suddenly became aware--

Johnson: Of the problems. Well, our letter was referred by Chancellor Heyns to President Kerr. And I can remember the letter came back to us with a little note from President Kerr which said, "What do the ladies want?" [laughter]

We thought we had been quite specific that we wanted some help to do this building over. But he apparently didn't think we were specific enough and we all had a chuckle over that-- "What do the ladies want?"

Riess: Do you think that in fact you hadn't come right out and said you wanted x-amount of money?

Johnson: I think that was it. We said our building was in bad shape and we needed to have all these changes made. But we weren't specific in saying, "Please give us some money to do this."

And then I think after that was when Chancellor Heyns appointed this committee of the two representatives from the two clubs. Now do you want me to get into that at this point?

3) The Board of Directors of the Association, 1965-1967, and the Fundraising Projects

Riess: I want to get into that, but not yet. As far as fund raising goes, first of all you said that you had a marvelous board. On your board were Betty Neely and Clarus Faubion and Marion Diamond and somebody "Heiss."

Johnson: Ann Heiss, Clara Wightman, Adeline Larson, Aletha Titmus. And Doras Briggs at that time attended because she was president of the Building Committee. The composition of the board changed during the two years. Bobbie Barton was on the Building Committee board too at that time.

Riess: Did you have anything to do with the strength of your board? As a president, I know that you're chosen from among the directors.

Johnson: After the annual meeting, the Board of Directors have an organization meeting, and that's when they elect their officers. So it was in April of 1965, after the annual meeting, that I was elected president. Clara Wightman was elected vice-president.

As far as determining the officers or the members of the board, I wouldn't have much to do with that. The terms are staggered, so there were still some members on the board who had been on there the previous year. Those who were nominated at the same time I was nominated had been chosen by the nominating committee, so I had really nothing to do with the selection of the women who were serving on the board when I did. That's why I said I was so very lucky. There was just this very dynamic group of women who had a lot of good ideas and the energy and enthusiasm to carry it out.

Riess: Fund raising does take a particular kind of willingness to really work. How did you actually raise that $12,000?

Johnson: I thought about a number of the things that we had. We had an art show here in the club that Aletha Titmus handled. (Her name now is Aletha Titmus Owens, and presently she is general counsel for the Hastings School of Law. At that time she was an associate counsel in the General Counsel's Office down in University Hall.) She headed the art show, which was a very elegant affair, here in the club. Some of the members contributed to the exhibition.

Riess: From their personal collections?

Johnson: Uh huh. And some of the things that we had were for sale, and there were a number of people who bought things.

Riess: Was this new, to open the club up in this way to the public?

Johnson: Yes, it was. We had a very large crowd who came.

Riess: People just plain curious about the club?

Johnson: I think it was mostly the campus community and our friends.

We had a dinner party in San Francisco. We went to one of the ACT plays, and beforehand there was a wine and cheese tasting party across the street in some building there. It was a Sunday afternoon. Katherine McGrail was the chairman of that particular event. Katherine McGrail was the coordinator of University Telecommunications.

One very fine event was Mme. Pandit, who spoke down in Pauley Ballroom, and Jane Welcome was the chairman of that event. Now, she wasn't on the board, but she was one of the members that we got to take over the event. And that drew a very large crowd. Elinor Heller, who was a regent at the time, introduced her [Mme. Pandit], and then we had a reception here after the lecture.

Riess: Was Mme. Pandit staying at the club?

Johnson: She stayed at the club one or two nights at that point. But no, I don't know how Jane arranged for this. She was visiting in the country and we sponsored the event.

Riess: Tickets were sold.

Johnson: Yes. And that was again to the general public, mainly the campus community. We had a very large crowd.

Riess: So you're drawing basically upon the campus community in all the events.

Johnson: Yes.

Riess: Did this open up the club in a way that resulted in a greater membership for the club do you think?

Johnson: Well, there was a small increase in membership. But for many, many years it stayed pretty level at about three hundred members. We'd get a number of new members, but then people would leave or they'd die and it just seemed to average out. So the large increase in membership hasn't come until just very recently.

And we had a cruise on the bay. That was chaired by Betty Strehl. (She is now Betty Kerley, the wife of vice-chancellor [Robert] Kerley.) She was responsible for the cruise on the bay. That was an evening affair. It was not a supper or a dinner of any kind; we just had this cruise on the bay. And that brought out a good crowd and was a very interesting evening.

Riess: Were there members of the club, while this was all going on, who thought that this was all very inappropriate?

Johnson: No, I don't believe so. We began to generate this enthusiasm and people participated. I mean at least they came to the events, supported the event.

Riess: Quite a different feeling in the club I should think.

Johnson: It was, it was. It was a period when it was very exciting.

We had a reception--this was at an annual dinner--for the women regents, who at that time were Elinor Heller and Catherine Hearst and Dorothy Chandler. Dorothy Chandler wasn't able to attend, but we had Mrs. Hearst and Mrs. Heller and we had a very large crowd for that. That was limited to members.

Riess: The members would pay?

Johnson: Oh, yes, there was a charge for the annual dinner, always.

4) Professional Advancement

Riess: I'd like to know if there were any very conscious efforts to use the club for other women's organization.

Johnson: The Faculty Wives used it for their monthly teas. A little later the Center for Continuing Education of Women used the clubhouse, had their headquarters here for a while.

Riess: But if there were professional associations of women meeting, say, on the Berkeley campus in the summer, would there be an immediate linkup with the club?

Johnson: Not necessarily. We would have a number of visiting women scholars who would stay here during the summertime, or maybe come for six months. But I don't remember that there were any specific affairs because there was something going on for women on the campus. You know, I just don't think that women were involved in that way at that time.

Riess: It's interesting that over the years, the Committee for the Professional Advancement of Women, which was a standing committee, I think, at the club since it began, met and didn't generate much of a report. But they did, in the late '50s and '60s. There must have been a very active committee person at that point.

Johnson: Well, that--could I mention one more thing about our fund raising events, because this was a big event too? That was the rummage sale that Doras Briggs was the chair for, and this was down in one of the university's parking lots. We had a Saturday and Sunday and we made quite a bit of money off of that, but that was a lot of hard work, getting the tables set up and handling it. So that was about the last of the special events that I noted in particular.

And then going back to your professional development. The club did have through the years a standing committee called the Professional Development Committee. I can remember at the annual meeting there was always a report from the Professional Development Committee, and their report would consist of statistics and the percentage of women faculty members to the whole faculty--and they would always go back to when the club was founded, in 1919--that percentage was dropping, you see, over the years.

I think, as I remember, originally 20 percent of the faculty was female, and that percentage just kept falling. There was great concern about this, but nobody could seem to do anything. They were also concerned as to the kind of faculty committees on which the women were asked to serve. They were never asked to serve on the powerful committees.

It was probably around 1967, '68, when this group of faculty women started meeting here in the club at noontime. That was Susan Ervin-Tripp, Laura Nader, Elizabeth Scott, Herma Kay and Babette Barton. They were at that time considering only advancement of the women in the academic area, but they soon expanded their studies to staff women also on the campus. And this coincided with the start of the women's rights movement.

Riess: This group of women, were they already members of the club?

Johnson: They were already members of the club.

Riess: And were they, in fact, the Professional Development Committee?

Johnson: I don't think so. I think this was an independent group that formed, because you had these beginnings of concern about women not being treated the same as men. And it had a great deal to do with the eventual effort on the part of the university authorities to try to promote women, both in the academic area and in the staff area.

Riess: Well, it certainly seems to be the stuff of which, you would think, many a lunchtime conversation would be composed around here.

Johnson: They met regularly for lunch and they got a lot of publicity in the Daily Cal and began to put on pressure.

I think in my own case personally it had some bearing on my advancement in my own area. The university has a management program. They also have their classification section, which was under the Personnel Office--you know, the layers and the various titles--and I had progressed to the level of Coordinator II. Now those titles have been changed, but that was as high as you could go, unless you could get into the management program.

I had asked on several occasions and thought I should be in the management program. Eventually I did get into it, but I'm sure that that had something to do with the pressure that was being brought to recognize women and promote them to higher staff positions.

Riess: You were the first woman at that level?

Johnson: I was not the first woman in the management program, no. But I do think when I finally went into it that all of this stirring up on the campus had some bearing on it. So I was always very grateful for what they did, even though I wasn't really personally involved in it.

Riess: When you were a member of the club, and you were meeting with other staff women over the years since you joined, were salaries and women's fair share and rights and everything, were they issues in the late '40s, in the '50s?

Johnson: Well no, they weren't. Women were discriminated against.

Riess: That was a very different kind [of discrimination].

Johnson: The university had its classification system and supposedly it applied to any employee, but there were certain classifications that you just thought of as belonging to women, and other classifications were generally [belonging to men].

In my own area it was very difficult for a woman to become a buyer or a senior buyer. That was the top. I was the first woman to become a senior buyer. There were several men in that classification, but it just wasn't considered a woman's job. Women were secretaries and principal clerks, and it was even very difficult to become an administrative assistant.

Riess: When you broke through that level, did you find the other women supportive and sort of cheering you on?

Johnson: Yes, I think so. And it sort of broke some ground, because then later on there were other women who were promoted into that category.

You know, we were pretty naive, because we didn't think of ourselves really as being discriminated against. That was just the way life was.

Riess: Well, I think that might be part of the nature of the club, that it made one feel good. I'm wondering whether it would be possible that this [the club] would be a place, because it was so special, that would give people this kind of deluded feeling that they had achieved something, even though it would only be membership-- a false sense of equality, for instance, with academic women, not that they had that much either. Here people wouldn't be likely to bring up thorny questions like that, because here was a safe harbor.

Johnson: Yes, I think you have a point there. For women of my generation, that was the way we were raised, that there was a certain niche that you fitted into and you didn't "rock the boat."

Riess: I think to make that breakthrough, it takes a committee of strong women or it takes a risky move.

Johnson: Oh, it does. A woman, to get ahead in her particular profession, had to be so much better than a man. In order to make that initial breakthrough.

Riess: In the original constitution, the purpose of the club was to "promote mutual acquaintance and fellowship among women who are officers of instruction and government of the university." In 1966, the primary purpose is "to promote and encourage educational and professional activities of women associated with the university." That seems a real change in direction.

Do you remember the rewriting of the constitution to that extent?

Johnson: I didn't remember that specific thing, and yet, I'm not surprised by it because again this was the period when you were just beginning to get these stirrings of the women's movement.

5) Issues of "Aging Residents" and Hiring Managers

Riess: Another issue you dealt with as a president apparently was the "aging residents" issue.

Johnson: I think I mentioned that they had been here for a long period of time, that the club had a reputation, more or less, of being an old ladies' home, because there were four people at least who had just lived here forever, almost from the Year One. [laughing] We really didn't do much about it until we got the money to renovate and redo the rooms. And then the policy was set that you could only live in the club for, oh, I don't know what it is now, a semester or a year. You couldn't have this long-term residence in the club. It is actually limited to I think a year's time. It could be a possibility of an extension for another year, but there's no real long-term residence anymore.

Riess: As president of the board, how involved were you with the parade of managers?

Johnson: Very much so. Lucille Phipps resigned during my presidency, and I had to interview for her replacement. The Berkeley Personnel Office helped us to find candidates. It was up to me to interview them and then to get the board to approve the woman I chose, who was a Pat [Patricia] Barnes. She was a live wire and contributed a great deal to all of the activities that we were carrying on at that time, and really did a great deal to revive the dining room.

Riess: She would have had an involvement in those wine and cheese parties?

Johnson: Oh yes, yes, and the special dinners that were put on and the menus that were chosen. But she only stayed with us about a year. And then we had to choose another one.

Riess: Dulcie James.

Johnson: She didn't stay very long.

Riess: And then the [Gaston] Abbos.

Johnson: The Abbos, we had great expectations from them. They were from France, but that didn't work out well either, and they didn't stay too long.

After that I was out, was really not involved, I wasn't on the board and I don't remember who the managers were; I was not involved in picking them.

Riess: It seems a very major responsibility for the president. You would sort of hope that you wouldn't have to deal with that in your term of office.

Johnson: Oh, when I got the news that Lucille Phipps was leaving us I was just devastated. What was I going to do? I was grateful for the help from the Personnel Office.

6) The Ad Hoc Committee and the Joint Operations Committee, and the Haas Gift, 1971

Johnson: So, we had all these fundraising activities, but we still couldn't raise enough money to do anything significant. We also had a program where we tried to get gifts, and there were a number of gifts made to the club, but we had to face up to the fact that we had set a goal that we probably couldn't attain.

About that time was when Chancellor Heyns formed his committee.* Aletha Titmus was asked to be the chairman, and I was still president of the club and was asked to serve on it, as was Betty Neely, who at that point was vice-president but would later become president. And I cannot remember all the men. Well, the president of the men's club. The only one I can remember is Bob Cockrell, but who else do you have?

Riess: Well, then you had Boris Bressler and Bob Brode.

*Ad hoc committee to study The Faculty Club and the Women's Faculty Club, formed by invitation from Chancellor Heyns, June 1967.

Johnson: Oh, yes. Oh, Professor Brode. It was a great committee and we had some really far out ideas of tearing down or moving the Senior Men's Hall and putting some kind of a walkway between the two clubs.

Riess: Did the men come onto that committee with the same feeling that something needed to be done?

Johnson: They were in a worse position than we were. I think that if they hadn't been they might not have been so interested in this. We weren't in debt; we just didn't have enough money to keep up. But they were in debt by a very great amount, and were not even able to raise the interest payments on their debt.

Riess: Presumably Heyns had been aware of their difficulty also and saw this as a great opportunity.

Johnson: To bring the two together. And at that period membership in faculty clubs had sort of gone out of style and people on the campus were eating at the Golden Bear on down the avenue someplace. It just wasn't the thing to do to gather at a faculty club. Again, their membership was falling and it was mainly those who were getting older and had been members for a number of years.

So, it really seemed the only answer was somehow or other to put the two clubs together and have a joint management. We were paying for our office and management staff; they were paying their office and management staff; we were both paying our kitchen staffs. It was such a duplication of expenses.

Riess: It was confidential, the committee?

Johnson: Well, not really, except we didn't report on our discussions, until we got to the point where if we were going to join the two clubs in some manner it had to be voted on by the members of the two clubs.

Riess: "All possibilities open to the two groups will be examined with a view to meeting possible subsequent objections to proposed programs from whatever quarters." It sounds like when this committee was put together, it was with the intention of combining the clubs. The point suggested by Heyns was--

Johnson: Was to review the programs of the clubs with emphasis on future needs and development and how best the clubs could relate to the campus community and to each other. We were working towards

Johnson: unity right from the beginning, and we had no idea, the three of us, that there would be such opposition by some of the members of the Women's Faculty Club.

Riess: The other feeling I certainly got is that the communication level was very low. Maybe that's because there was so little interest in the club at all?

Johnson: You know, you'd have an annual meeting and you'd have trouble getting a quorum, until finally it was changed that the quorum was the number of active members present. [laughing] And maybe you'd have twenty people!

Riess: So this ad hoc committee didn't report to the club in that three year period.

Johnson: No, not until we were ready with our final recommendation. But by the time we were ready for our final recommendation for the two clubs to vote on it, some of our thoughts had gotten out and you had this opposition building up. And it was a very well-organized opposition.

Riess: You were no longer the president at that point.

Johnson: No, I was no longer the president. By that time I guess it was Margaret Thal-Larsen.

That initial committee was in effect until our recommendation was made to the full membership. They didn't really vote it down, but there were so many strings attached to it--

The men voted to accept it.

Riess: How were Bressler and Brode and Cockrell to work with?

Johnson: They were very nice to work with.

Riess: It felt like equals struggling?

Johnson: Yes. And I'm sure a great deal of that was due to the fact that Aletha Titmus was the chairman.

Riess: Anne Low-Beer, you, Emily Huntington, and Mary Lou Norrie then became the official joint operations committee. The ad hoc came out from underground?

- Johnson: I guess that was it. And I'm trying to remember, because the membership for the men changed, and Hump [Orvin W.] Campbell, who was the vice-chancellor for administration, he came on that committee and almost immediately said, "I think I can find us some gift funds." And he found a million dollars to be divided between the two clubs. The men's club got two thirds of it and we got one third.
- Riess: I received from vice-chancellor Kerley information on the terms of the Haas gift and how it was to be used in the Women's Education Center and the rehabilitation of the Women's Faculty Club, which I'll just include with the oral history.*
- Johnson: At one point does it tell where the funds came from, because at one point that was supposed to be confidential, but everybody got to know who it was.
- Riess: Well, it is Strauss Associates, which is the Haas family.
- Johnson: That is what really gave us the shot in the arm, when we got that money and could go ahead with the complete renovation of the club.
- Riess: How did that money actually come to you? You said that Hump Campbell got onto the committee.
- Johnson: And he worked with the Haas family. You know, they've been very generous to the university.
- Riess: Did Hump Campbell come onto the committee and see that the situation was really at a financial crisis point and then go directly to Heyns and say, "You've got to do something"? What do you think?
- Johnson: I think when he came onto the committee he recognized the cause of the crisis--maybe he was put on the committee because it was recognized if we were going to save these two clubs, something had to be done. I really don't know, I just know when he came on the committee and he heard us talking about how were we going to get some money, that he made the statement, "Well, now, maybe I can get some gift money."
- Riess: How was it to serve on such a frustrating committee for three years?
- Johnson: It was frustrating. You know, we just thought we were spinning wheels and we were never getting any place. And then, when we finally came up with the recommendations, to have the opposition that we met with here in this club, it was very discouraging,

*In The Bancroft Library.

Johnson: because that opposition started before we had any idea that there might be another source of funds. So, you just felt the thing was going to go under, and wasn't that going to be too bad!

There was some talk that the university would take over this building, but what would they do with it? We hoped they wouldn't tear it down. It was a bad time. And now I'm so happy to see what's been done with it. Never has the club been so affluent! From the very, very beginning it had been a struggle.

Riess: The proposal that the joint operations committee of Anne Low-Beer, Mary Ann Johnson, Emily Huntington, and Mary Lou Norrie came up with was put to the vote of the membership in December of 1970. And this is when you got that unsettled outcome with a majority saying yes, but it wasn't nearly a clear majority. Mary Lou Norrie, in a letter to the membership, says that at least it's getting it out into the air and now "we will really begin to study this in a new way and a new level and will come back to you with a new proposal."

Johnson: By that time I was beginning to withdraw from it. I was of the group who felt we should join with the men's club. And there was this other group--Josephine Smith and Florence Minard in particular--who took a very strong role in opposing it and wrote letters and did telephoning and so forth. And they were very successful in getting enough people on their side.

As it turned out, I think it all worked out for the best. But if we hadn't gotten this gift, I think we'd have gone under unless we joined with the men. It was the gift that enabled us to renovate the clubhouse and to put those rental rooms in shape so that we could really rent them. And that's what now is giving us our chief source of income. So if we hadn't been able to do that, or hadn't joined with the men's club, I think we would have folded. They had this women's center here for a while, but for some reason that didn't work out. I don't know enough about that because I wasn't involved with it. And the dining room had closed. The people who lived here went over to the men's club to eat. [As of January 1972 the dining room had closed completely.]

Riess: The terms of getting that money involved the joint operation?

Johnson: It was expected with that gift that the two clubs would operate jointly, but then it didn't work out that way.

Riess: The early opposition involved the question of whether all that money was needed for renovation. That was one of the things that Florence Minard tried to prove, that there had been a gross overestimation of how much needed to be done. [see Jan. 5, 1971 report to members]

Johnson: That was before we got the gift, and where it seemed we were going to have to try to raise that money ourselves if we were going to be able to continue. And they thought our estimate was too large. Well, as it turned out, our estimate wasn't anywhere near enough. Our sights were to raise $60,000, and get $120,000 from the Regents, as I remember. And we eventually ended up spending way over $300,000.

But my recollection was that they were mainly opposed on two grounds: that the men hadn't wanted the women in the beginning, and that was why the Women's Faculty Club was started; and secondly, that the men had this big debt, and we were going to have to help them pay it off, even though the agreement we proposed took care of that, that that debt was going to be something separate, the women would never have to assume any part of it. But it was a strong talking point that they had that we were going to be taking on the debt that the men had, and we were debt-free.

Riess: I think of Josephine Smith in particular as being concerned about this?

Johnson: I think she just didn't quite trust the fact that even though we weren't assuming any of the debt that the men had, if we joined with them it was going to be inevitable that somehow or other we would become responsible for paying for it.

7) The Club Operates in the Black, 1977

Riess: We're talking about a struggle that was resolved in 1976; that's when Josephine Smith brought up more financial points, and that's when the merger was voted down.

Johnson: But by that time we had gotten the money. The money came--it must have come in 1971--but it took quite a while before they got going with the changes, and then it took a long, long time for the remodeling of the club. We put in the elevator and the rooms were changed--they hadn't all had private baths--and all these bathrooms were built in. The work took a long time. And then they had to have a special ramp for bringing handicapped people in.

Riess: So you're saying that it took a long time before you could really see that the operation was in the black?

Johnson: Before we were ready to reopen the building and start making money! And yes, let me see, by 1977 we were operating in the black and to the point where we could do some other things, like reupholstering the furniture and doing over the lounge in the library. Norma Willer was responsible for the re-decoration and did a magnificent job. I became chairman of the budget and finance committee right after I retired, which probably was in the spring of '78. And by that time they had a nice cushion, and we were concerned then with bringing our salaries up to standard--replacing some of the equipment in the kitchen that had been there since it was done over in '57.

Riess: I have an image of the feeling of sort of a wave having washed over the club and then everything was all calm.

Johnson: [chuckling] Because we didn't have to pinch pennies and we suddenly became an efficient operation.

Riess: It's so much like an identity crisis, also.

Johnson: Oh, yes, I think--the image has changed, and now, you see, we have men members, we've got men serving on the Board of Directors, men living here. The same with the men's club: they opened it up to women and they've had women on their board.

We've gone ahead of them because we have such a fine dining room. And we have a lot of men, now, coming here because our food is better than at the men's club. The whole atmosphere in that dining room has changed. It used to be you'd go in there and maybe there were a half a dozen people having lunch, and now it's packed, you have to have a reservation. Oh, the atmosphere has changed entirely!

When Philip Habib was here, before Charter Day, he came as the Regent's Lecturer or Sather Lecturer or something--the lecture they have before the Charter Day every year--he stayed here for ten days.

Riess: Oh, that is splendid.

Johnson: Yes. And we've had any number of very prominent, international figures staying here. Maxine Rockwell [manager] can tell you that. So, the whole atmosphere has changed.

The only thing that we don't have anymore are the evening affairs, because people don't want to come onto the campus in the evening. And there's no parking around here at night to speak of. It's very limited.

Johnson: We used to have dinner every so often and we'd have a Christmas party with some kind of entertainment afterwards. We got pretty good crowds. But people just don't come out for evening affairs. I asked about the possibility of something in the evening, and this was the answer I was given. And when I think about it, I'm not so sure that I would come to an evening affair anymore, because I live out at Rossmoor now and I just don't come into Berkeley at night because of the security problems.

But we are having nice affairs at noontime; the Charter Day luncheon has turned into a very, very nice affair; and every so often there's a luncheon of some special kind, rather than the special dinners that we used to have. The "Lunch and Learn" that they have takes the place of something that we used to have in the evening. That program, incidentally, was started by Doras Briggs.

Riess: You mentioned Susan Ervin-Tripp and the women who met and used the club as a forum. Can you remember other groups who used the club?

Johnson: Yes. The Cowell Hospital group used to come for lunch, I don't know, once a week or once a month, and they would be all the people from Cowell Hospital. There would be a group of us that would come, not on a regular basis, from University Hall. We'd make a special point of coming up for lunch.

There are departmental luncheons here, and they're partly business and partly just to have lunch together, and that happens frequently. Oh, there's a woman's bridge group that meets once a month. I think that's mainly retired members. So yes, there are special groups that make this their meeting place. It is a fine place to entertain guests.

Riess: Well, I think that takes it through the history that you're most particularly identified with. I think we can stop. Thank you. It has been very interesting.

Eleanor Van Horn
June 17, 1982
Interviewed in her home in Berkeley

1) Departmental Secretary at the University of California

Riess: I start all these interviews by asking a little bit about the professional history of the person I'm talking to. Are you a University of California graduate?

Van Horn: No, no, I am not. I came to the university in 1925 as a, I won't say "shy," young secretary--but at least I was in the beginning.

Riess: Who hired you and in what department?

Van Horn: It was Miss Vera Christie. She was a remarkable woman, a wonderful administrator, and she gave me two or three temporary secretarial assignments. The first was with old Professor [Willis L.] Jepson, who was a botanist, a wonderful gentleman who taught me much. Then I went temporarily to the chairman of the Geology Department in old Bacon Hall, and Dean of the College of Letters and Science, Professor [George D.] Louderback. He had a fascinating office, surrounded by specimens of rock, which the citizens of California kept sending to him for analysis.

Then I think about that time, the university's building bond campaign had been undertaken in 1926. There was quite an extended building program that was under [Robert Gordon] Sproul, I mean Dr. Sproul; he was Mr. Sproul then. He was the university controller and director for the project, which ran about six to nine months. He needed a secretary for that bond campaign project, so Miss Christie sent me to him and I worked in California Hall in the same office with Miss [Agnes] Robb, who was, of course, Mr. Sproul's right-hand Girl Friday. It was wonderful to see her functioning, really, in that office.

I had a close association with Mr. Sproul in that I took his dictation separately for the building campaign, and learned much from him! I remember his saying once, "Mrs. van Horn, never presume!" I had assumed something or other and he asked why

Van Horn: a certain action hadn't taken place. I explained my part in it. Then he said, in that commanding voice of his, "Never presume," which I've never forgotten. [chuckles]

Riess: Was that a little bit of his wish always to be consulted about everything?

Van Horn: No, just that I had not made every effort to determine a certain piece of information. I had assumed something, when I should have investigated a little further. He was absolutely right, which was a very valuable lesson to learn from someone of his calibre. He was really marvelous.

The controller's office was a very good office. The girls were conscientious, serious.

Riess: With business school training? What kind of training would you say the secretaries had?

Van Horn: I would say probably not, as I recall. I think the girls with whom I was associated (because my desk was there), I would say that they were not university-trained, as I was not. I went to a very good business school, the Munson School for Private Secretaries. Did you ever hear of it, in San Francisco?

Riess: Munson? No.

Van Horn: It was an excellent school then, I think the best there was. And I had had a little post-graduate work after high school at Polytechnic High School in San Francisco. But I had never, for family reasons, I had never attended the university. After I came here, I had the feeling, "This is where I want to be." And so I started auditing courses and took some University Extension work.

But to go back to the controller's office--this really is an interesting part of a lower level personnel development; it also shows one can well believe in miracles. I've had many of them happen! While I was associated with Mr. Sproul (as I say, he was then Mr. Sproul), he had a call one day from Professor [David Prescott] Barrows, the Chairman of the Political Science Department, whom we always called General Barrows because he did have a military title. Are you familiar with his name at all?

Riess: Yes.

Van Horn: I was Professor Barrow's secretary (as well as secretary of the department) until he retired. But the evolution of it was that one day he phoned Mr. Sproul saying that his secretary was ill and could Mr. Sproul spare anyone to help him for a couple of weeks. So I was assigned to do this and went to the Political Science Department office, which was on the second floor of beautiful South Hall. And I just fell in love with it.

He was a perfectly charming man, you know, very handsome. Did you ever see him?

Riess: I've seen pictures of him.

Van Horn: Oh, but never met him. Such a commanding presence, so handsome, wonderful voice, and with the loveliest, most gracious manners.

I was there for two weeks, and at that time I thought, "Oh how I would love to be in this department." And in a few months time, no, in a year's time--because after the building campaign had been concluded I was asked to continue in the Controller's Office--in a year's time, the position in Political Science became vacant and it was offered to me. So, miracle number 1.

Riess: The career of a secretary in 1926--how high did you expect that you would be able to go in your wildest imaginings?

Van Horn: I didn't think very much about it. I have never been "ambitious" or "career-minded," somehow or other. I was so completely nourished by being in the academic environment that it made no difference, if I continued to grow and develop, as I hoped I would. I learned so much from these minds with which I was constantly associated.

Riess: Talking about women on the campus, the university must have taken advantage of the feeling you expressed that the atmosphere here was so enriching as to make the service something you would have done practically voluntarily.

Van Horn: Yes. Actually, Mrs. Riess, although I did not have formal university training, I had an excellent education. My basic education was in San Francisco, though I had earlier attended Miss Head's School in Berkeley after French Kindergarten, and then the McKinley School. Then I attended Miss Hamlin's private school and ultimately went to Lowell High School, which was the academic high school in those days. I was ready for more learning.

Riess: I'm talking about a tradition of under-pay at the university that is underwritten by the fact that the university is such a wonderful place that people willingly accept what they can get.

Van Horn: You are stating it exactly correctly at the time, because I was really an efficient secretary. Some of my friends said, "You know, you really could earn more if you were in business." And it made no appeal to me. I said I would prefer to sacrifice any additional income for being in this environment. I think there were plenty of girls who felt the same way. Some of my associates did, not all of them.

Riess: When you came to work at the university, where did you live?

Van Horn: I lived in Oakland at first and then moved to Berkeley. I was married at the time. My husband and I were divorced in 1932. I had originally lived in Berkeley, where I was born, but later in San Francisco. I had had a business background; I had worked for the Young Women's Christian Association Pacific Coast Headquarters, had a fine experience there. We had an excellent office manager, Miss [Elizabeth] Ristine, and I learned very much from her. And then I worked as secretary to the manager of the Methodist Book Concern, Mr. Howard M. Boys, an admirable man who taught me much, too. But I had several positions with business firms, so I had a business point of view. I had a variety of experiences, and this revealed different modus operandi, really. It let me know how impersonal and tough a business environment could be.

2) The Lunch Hour

Riess: When you first were on the campus in 1925, the Women's Faculty Club did have their wonderful building. Do you remember ever noticing it or giving it a thought?

Van Horn: Oh, yes, but let me make this observation. At that time, it was reserved to faculty. There were women faculty, of course.

Riess: Oh, I know. But they did let some very high-level staff join.

Van Horn: Well, I don't recall when they started doing that, but I never gave it a thought, except being invited to have lunch there occasionally with members.

Van Horn: I was invited to become a member in 1952, I believe. At that time, I was not drawn in to any activity of the club. When I joined I would simply go for lunch, but I wasn't drawn in in any way. I didn't have any particular ongoing interest.

I was so involved in the operations of the department. The work became increasingly heavier, but very welcome, with responsibility for increased staff, as well as functioning as the assistant to the chairman. Then much later we began to prepare for conversion to the quarter system scheduled for 1966-67. I mean, I was responsible for all of the paper work and everything incidental for that process. I was just so involved that I didn't pay any attention to the functioning of the club.

Riess: You would certainly have taken your hour lunch and been able to shed those responsibilities for an hour, wouldn't you?

Van Horn: Oh, I would go there at times for lunch, oh yes!

Riess: Your associates there, were there other departmental secretaries, and were they inclined to talk about the same kinds of burdens?

Van Horn: Well, my campus associates, one who had very much the same feeling that I did was Hazel Niehaus. We have remained friends. We see each other occasionally and go to the club for lunch always. She had a wonderful experience, too. She was the university printer's right hand, Mr. Joseph Flynn. She was a girl without formal education, I mean university education. She had attended business college, but she grew in her position and was a wonderful administrative assistant who had wide contacts. Very social, very nice. She and I would sometimes have lunch. But we didn't spend the time doing post-mortems on all of our problems. We would share them, but we talked about other things. For instance, we both belonged to the St. Moritz Ice Skating Club [of Berkeley] and we'd talk about the politics of the ice rink. We participated in the program to raise money for the ice rink, Iceland; we bought shares in it; we would go every week to ice skate, and that would be one subject of discourse. But we didn't dwell on the functioning of the Women's Faculty Club or how it was organized or how it operated.

Riess: I think there would be so much you could learn from the network of the secretaries at the university and the administrators. So if you wouldn't have that conversation in the club where you met, where would you?

Van Horn: Well, maybe when we had a coffee break we would go over to the Co-op. You know, the student Co-op used to be in Stephen's Hall, then called the Union. They had a very nice counter, and we'd traipse over about 3:00 or 3:30, as we would stagger our time. We needed that cup of coffee for fifteen minutes [chuckles]! But I didn't really know any of the faculty who were members of the Women's Faculty Club at that time, except Professor Emily Huntington.

Riess: Why did you know her particularly?

Van Horn: Because I knew her when she was a high school student at Miss Hamlin's School in San Francisco. I thought about this when I attended the memorial service for her. She was just a bright-eyed, very attractive, outgoing, high-spirited young woman, when I was just a little boarding school girl of ten. To see her as she emerged from that bright-eyed girl whom I've never forgotten made just a lovely link. And she remembered me; she would always speak [to me] when we met on the campus. But I don't think I ever had lunch with her.

Riess: When you were lunching there in the '50s, who were some of the, to your mind, more interesting, more dynamic women who would be at the club.

Van Horn: Well, of course, that was after Dean [Lucy] Stebbins. Dean [Mary B.] Davidson, Professor Barbara Nachtrieb of the Law School, Martha Chickering in Social Welfare, Emily Noble in Economics. There was someone in Decorative Arts; I didn't know Professor [Hope] Gladding at that time. I'd have to think a little bit more about it.

Riess: Did you go to the parties and involve yourself in that way?

Van Horn: No, no. I really did not become involved that socially until after I retired. It wasn't that I wouldn't have, but the occasions didn't seem to arise. Also, I didn't go to the club as often as I might have simply because it became a matter of timing. I'd have a late lunch anyhow--I usually went to lunch about 1:00 p.m. And the club stopped serving at about 1:00 then--now it's 1:30. Come to think about it, that's probably one reason why I didn't go more often. And I did have other, outside interests.

It just seemed to work out better for the office, and I got so that I much preferred the late lunch hour. Something was usually going on at noon, and it seemed an undesirable time for me to be away. The chairman might be there and he wouldn't always be going off promptly for lunch. It just worked out.

Van Horn: As I say, I enjoyed the club very much, it was a very gracious spot, it was an oasis in the middle of a maybe exacting day. But all of this I relished no matter what the situation was.

Riess: Incidentally, was the Men's Faculty Club used by your department members?

Van Horn: It was not used heavily by the members of our department, as I recall. As my area of awareness kept expanding, I became conscious of the fact that not all of the faculty belonged-- I expected all of them would be members, and then I found that a number of them were not. I soon came to know the ones who were habitués, and those who went occasionally, and those who only went when they were driven, those who had to go to a meeting that was a "command performance." And then, maybe, social, or if there was some special occasion.

Some faculty were of a less social temperament, some felt that the dues weren't worth it to them, or they just didn't care for the food there. Some went over to play cards, play poker or something, regularly--there would be a group from other departments. And without thinking about it, I came to know, "Oh, well, Professor So-and-So; if you want him he'll probably be at the club playing cards." That sort of thing emerged. But I would say, offhand that at that time, the thirties and forties, probably not more than half the department faculty were club members. It may have changed later, but that's my recollection.

Riess: I would have assumed that all faculty women would have joined the Women's Faculty Club. But on the contrary--

Van Horn: Well, the academic animal--depending on his (or her) field, discipline--is more apt to be less social.

3) The Planning Committee

Van Horn: As I say, it's only since I've retired that I've become really involved in the club. And that was through an invitation to become a member of a committee.

Riess: What committee was that?

Van Horn: I was invited to join I guess what you would call the planning committee, with Norma Willer. She was the "chairman," and I, and a third member, Lea Miller I believe, who did not serve

Van Horn: very long because she suffered a stroke. As I recall, she had an expertise in decorative arts. And this was a very interesting and pleasant assignment. I enjoyed it very much. We became involved in the redecoration of the club. It was carrying on with what Peg Uridge, the president, had tried to do.

Riess: Peg Uridge's presidency was from 1973-1978.

Van Horn: Oh, yes; I knew her personally. She was an old friend.

Riess: You're talking about after Peg Uridge?

Van Horn: As a matter of fact, while Peg was president. While she was there, I spent a little more time and I'd have more conversation with her when I'd have lunch with her, and I became more interested in what she was trying to do, bless her dear heart. Every now and then she'd ask me to go with her to pick out some material--maybe to reupholster a chair or something like that. So I began that way. I'd go with her to a decorator's shop in Alameda and we'd look over stuff and make a decision; and then we might go to another shop to look further.

I forget exactly when the planning committee became a committee as such—I think it was under Katherine Williams because Peg subsequently became ill. But she was magnificent through all that reconstruction of the club, all that heavy work. The fortitude that woman had!

Riess: And so, this was after the merger issue?

Van Horn: Yes. I listened to the arguments. I remember one dinner meeting, at which we had to vote. That was under President Margaret Thal-Larsen, who was a friend of mine. Margaret and I were really good friends; she had been a graduate student in the Political Science Department. She had a Ph.D. degree and was one of our few women doctoral candidates. A brilliant girl, really a darling, brilliant girl.

I knew that this issue, the merger, was going to get squeakier and I really didn't feel that I grasped all the implications of it. I mean, I listened to the arguments and, of course, I knew Josephine Smith, who was very persuasive in her point of view. She was a member of the St. Moritz Ice Skating Club to which I belonged and I had known her since she was assistant to the university budget officer (comptroller). I had to have many telephone exchanges with her over budgetary matters. But she and I were friends and always got along.

Van Horn: I finally did vote for the merger, feeling not completely persuaded. But I felt that it was going to happen and that we'd better be forward-looking. But subsequently the arguments were very persuasive that we were going to be carrying the Men's Faculty Club debts.

Riess: But you say that subsequently you came to change your mind.

Van Horn: I may have changed, but there was no opportunity for changing a vote. I began to doubt my, shall I say "wisdom," and I think that I came to agree that it probably was the right decision [not to merge].

I did pay attention to the observation of one Men's Faculty Club member who admitted that the management of the men's club was just abysmal. I think he was really sympathetic, that it wouldn't be rational to merge. And that was good objectivity to pay attention to.

Riess: The people who felt most strongly included some of the very oldest members who had a deep attachment to the building and its contents.

Van Horn: Oh, I think so. And very easy to understand. The two organisms really just are so different. Think of the men who really appreciate the amenities of the Women's Faculty Club.

I've had many meals in the Men's Faculty Club. It is a charming place, it has a great deal of ambience. But when I became involved in the redecoration and the refreshment of the Women's Faculty Club--there are some very interesting observations on that process that I could make if you wanted them--I realized that the feminine hand was so absent in terms of niceties that are reasonable to expect in a men's club. Everything doesn't have to be "spit and polish," of course, but there was so much neglect that it began to be really--it began not to be so attractive. Some things would be so battered and not cared for and stained--a certain amount of this contributes to "charm," of course, and it's easy to understand.

Heaven's, look at some of the colleges at Oxford University, where I visited once. One of our department visitors one year was the Rector of All Souls College (as I recall) and he invited me to call when I went to visit Oxford. He entertained me for tea in his "digs" and took me to see the dining room of the college, rather "beaten up" the way you might expect it to be, you know. Somehow or other you could accept it; you wouldn't want it to be pristine. But there's a balance between a sort Van Horn: of indifference to, well, stained upholstery; how far is that to go? The piano--stained by glasses being set upon it. How far do you let that go? Is that for atmosphere?

The point I am trying to make is that there are some men to whom this really gets through. And I think they prefer to have a polished table instead of a scarred one.

And of course the comment's been made that the food has improved so much in the Women's Faculty Club over The Faculty Club (men's). A number of the men have claimed that the place to go for good food is to the Women's Faculty Club.

Riess: Tell me about the planning and redecorating. You worked with Norma Willer.

Van Horn: She was the key to it, along with the president, of course. It was Norma who redesigned the lounge.

Riess: Now, was this for the club, or was this in her professional capacity?

Van Horn: Oh no, this was for the club. She did this on her own time. I mean, this was her contribution as a member of the club. I remember that she painted--drew and painted in color--a redesign layout of the lounge. Do you remember it the way it used to be?

Riess: No.

Van Horn: Well, it looked very different. We had drapes, curtains, long, sort of off-white curtains which I never felt completely happy with. But I wouldn't have said so because Peg Uridge was responsible for their being there, and I would never have wanted her to feel hurt. She may have felt a little uncomfortable about them because a member of the club had volunteered to make them. It was a loving thing to do and they really looked nice. But I think some members of the club felt, "Really, can't we do better?" And ultimately the curtains were eliminated and the Riviera blinds were installed--we didn't have those then.

The beautiful big Oriental rug was over on the south side of the lounge. And the long library table that's used whenever we have parties--you know, for serving--was way over closer to the fireplace. A long couch faced the fireplace, against the table, and the table, with lamps, had magazines strewn over it. The piano was in the corner on the north side of the room, near Dean Davidson's picture. All the other pieces were in

Van Horn: different spots: that red Chinese cabinet that's on the east wall stood against the west wall; a few other pieces were completely differently placed. The furniture was not as it appears now, because all of those pieces were reupholstered.

Norma drew all of this in a new arrangement and had ideas about which pieces to recover and certain effects or certain colors or designs. The refreshments that we carried on--having new lampshades made, shifting pictures, etcetera, well, those were the basic items.

Riess: Were the walls white before?

Van Horn: Yes, the coloring was the same, no change in the walls. It was a very attractive graphic exhibit which Norma presented. And I remember when the Board of Directors was to vote on the design or approve it, she wasn't able to attend the meeting, so she asked me if I would go in her place and present it. I was surprised, really, and it was very pleasing, how readily everybody reacted to the design and the suggested upholstery samples. The board was completely in favor of it right away. So this meant that we could proceed to the materials, decide on the designs. And this was lots of fun.

I did go to the city with Norma on occasion. Because Norma as an architect had access to decorators' studios, we went to some of the sources for furnishings and materials places, which I'd never seen. You know, you have to have an entrée. It was really a great pleasure. And to see Norma functioning, too! So we would all agree, the three of us; and sometimes just she and I might agree upon a certain pattern or a certain material.

Riess: Did you have to have them approved at all?

Van Horn: I don't think so, in every case. They trusted her taste. Maybe I should amend that by saying, undoubtedly--yes, she must, yes, of course, she checked with the president, she checked with Katherine, and with the manager, Maxine Rockwell.

Riess: There was money to do that refurnishing then, I take it?

Van Horn: Well, money became successively available. We could do certain things up to a point and the Board of Directors would commit a certain amount of money. And then there would be another wave of acquisition and more funds. This would be transmitted to Norma, and she rode herd on the budget outlays.

Van Horn: As soon as all this was accomplished and all the shiftings were made--I'm sure there were some, well, not disagreements but not everyone saw eye to eye where we might place a particular piece, an object d'art; I mean that goes on all the time. I participated in the arrangement of certain pieces, the Chinese carvings for instance; I determined where they might be placed, and my suggestions were accepted.

Riess: When this was all finished, was there any kind of dedication of the new room?

Van Horn: There was a reception, as I recall.

4) A Close-up Look at the Rooms

Van Horn: And then, after that, we began to work on all the individual rooms, because they needed so much attention. We made an inventory of all the rooms. You know, there are twenty-five rooms for rent. There are twenty-six, but one of them is occupied by Mrs. [Kay] McCrodden who's the night resident manager.

Three years ago, when I had been evicted from my rented flat [which had been sold], and I moved to the club for two months, as a member of the committee then I had a wonderful opportunity to become intimately acquainted with all of these rooms.

I couldn't be sure of occupying a room continuously. While I was there I moved eight times. The rooms were all committed to others--and this shows the extent of the activity. There are so many visitors from abroad or from other places, cities or institutions, in this country, and one or two who return every year. One man even kept his room all of the time. He'd be away for months, leaving some of his things in one of the closets. I was able to have his room twice when he was away, and when he returned I would have to lug all my clothes and other possessions to another room.

Riess: So they get a double income from that room?

Van Horn: I think not. They have an agreement on its use. So it was seven different rooms, though I moved eight times because I could go back to the same room. It became a joke; we just laughed about it. Sometimes one of the maids helped me shift all my things, up or down. How much I appreciated the elevator!

Van Horn: But this gave me an opportunity to see the condition of these rooms so I was able to make more refined reports on what was needed. I really was appalled at the condition of some of the rooms. There were several rooms that began to look so sad. The shades, for instance, would be torn. I remember in a particular room one chair even had a broken leg, and the occupant, a man, was sitting on that chair with three legs, working at the desk. There were spots on the carpets and stains and scratches on the furniture! I was able to find a very good furniture man who could do refinishing, and I persuaded him to be willing to take on the club. I arranged also for a man who would take the contract for making new drapes and blinds for all of the rooms. So if you were to go into the rooms now, it's just as though they had gone through a metamorphosis.

Riess: If things were going as well as they were in the club financially with some money being available, those repairs must have been on somebody's agenda. You're not suggesting that you brought it to their attention that things had come to this state of affairs.

Van Horn: Oh, no! They knew it. But I could help particularize it at times. We made a card record of each room: its condition, what it needed. We made a tour. I'd go with Katherine or else with Norma and on occasion the three of us were together.

Ultimately, what I loved was being responsible for hanging some of the pictures. I love to hang pictures!

Riess: Were the pictures all there?

Van Horn: No, we had to buy many of them. At least Norma did; I never bought any. She ordered and had delivered a number of pictures, and then sometimes we'd consult or maybe I'd make a few decisions or I'd refer to Katherine or Maxine, or we decided to reverse a decision. And I can't tell you what fun it was. We'd try this picture, "No, it wasn't compatible with this room, no. It'll be better in 208." There are two large rooms with twin beds, 208 and 308, really very sweet.

5) Recent Managers and Presidents

Van Horn: Katherine, you know, has a background in interior decorating. I believe that maybe her family, or her husband had been an interior decorator. She's done a great deal for the club. And Maxine Rockwell has had experience, too. She's a very interesting woman. She was an undergraduate and graduate student in Political

Van Horn: Science, and has a master's degree in international relations. I knew her as a graduate student. And when she turned up at the club I was just delighted! She remembered me and I remembered her. We're very friendly and spend time chatting when we have the opportunity. I'm under the impression that she first came maybe part-time, not full-time, but I'm not at all certain about this. But she's an excellent manager. And she was very skillful at managing during the upheaval.

That was really a hard time for the staff when all the renovations were made; the sprinkler system was put in, the elevator had to be installed to meet local code requirements. For three stories you have to have an elevator now.

Riess: I think that the manager before Maxine was Mrs. Curtis.

Van Horn: Mrs. Curtis, yes. And then she was either ill or had an accident as I recall. Then there was another manager. But the whole physical arrangement downstairs in the basement was just so different. They didn't really have an efficient set-up physically. Dear Peg could cope with any situation; whether it was a mass of unorganized material whirling around her made no difference. She was above it all. She was just marvelous. She had had a very important position in the University Library.

I remember visiting her once or twice in her office, quite a large one. [Excitedly] It was the most jam-packed of any office I ever saw! Records and papers, not so many books but papers jammed everywhere. It was almost as if she were surrounded by a bank of papers. And her desk was overflowing. Her thesis was that you didn't waste time putting things back that you were going to use. If a drawer would be open, leave it open, because you're going to use it shortly. Don't put that away, you're going to use it pretty soon! She just thought it was wasted energy to put everything back.

Riess: Now how did she have time to be the president of the club?

Van Horn: Well, I think it was after she retired.

Riess: And that's the case for Katherine Williams?

Van Horn: Oh, definitely. She was assistant registrar, you know, on the campus. That's how I knew her. We would do business, hot business on the phone, over a lot of things, especially the General Catalogue. But then, we always had a very good relationship. She could be hard-hitting; she might "come down" on you if there was something you couldn't deliver on. But she was really great.

6) Club Decor, and Club Use

Van Horn: I think that the club is just so fortunate to have these two women who work so well together. Even now I keep noticing slowly little, I won't say refinements, but little improvements or changes here and there.

Riess: Like what?

Van Horn: For instance, on the dining room tables we used to have milk-glass vases. Some people thought they were charming, others thought them less than charming. I think it was probably Katherine who brought in the little ceramic dishes with those cute little dried flower arrangements in them. Now those have been removed and I noticed recently that each pot is tastefully planted with little ferns.

Riess: Was the library redone with your help?

Van Horn: No. Norma was certainly responsible for all of that redesigning. The Board of Directors decided to make it a memorial to Mrs. Uridge. So Norma was completely responsible for all of the designing of it. She's done a lot of work for the club. And have you noticed the little plaque which is above the door?

Riess: I haven't, I regret to say.

Van Horn: It says that the library is a memorial to Margaret W. Uridge. It's very tasteful. Previously the library had Dean Stebbins's picture hanging over the desk. That is a lovely Chinese desk by the way. Well, it was decided to remove the picture since the room is now a memorial to Margaret. The portrait was hung in the dining room, but now it's been shifted to the hall, the foyer; it looks handsome there. Dean Stebbins was a lovely, lovely woman. [N.B. The portrait has now been moved to the lounge, and hangs on the wall in place of Dean Davidson's portrait which has gone elsewhere as it was a loan, I understand. E.vH.]

Riess: Have you done any other committee work with the club?

Van Horn: No, no, I haven't. I think the committee rather dwindled away. But every now and then Katherine and I have a conversation about changing something or doing something. As a matter of fact, I suggested moving Dean Stebbins's portrait to the foyer.

Riess: It's interesting that you bring up Dean Stebbins's portrait. I think that there still is a lot of difficulty in the club in just doing things, that there are a lot of people who still think, "Oh, what's it doing there?"

Van Horn: Oh, yes. This is bound to be, this is bound to be.

Riess: You think it's bound to be?

Van Horn: Oh, yes. Peoples' tastes are so different--what looks just right looks perfectly awful to someone else. Taste is a very delicate subject to ponder.

Riess: Yes, but it's also a matter of change.

Van Horn: Exactly. And it's very easy to appreciate this, to understand it. Some people like change for the sake of change, regardless of what it does to any effect or of any disturbance. Sensitive eyes that have a wide angle will feel that moving one part--as in a painting with an artist--if you change one little part of it, it affects the whole, and then this becomes a chain reaction and you can't stop. I think there are people who, maybe unconsciously, are a little apprehensive of a certain change, because that means that something else is going to have to pay the price. It's very easy to be sympathetic--one's temperament, one's conditioning is involved. Who knows?

I had a picture framed at Maxwell Gallery years ago--it happened to be this one here on my wall, a Breugel. I remember the young woman who helped me decide on the framing of it said, "You know, it's almost impossible to discuss taste."

I'm sure that changes in the club can't help but bother some, not necessarily the, as they say, "older" members. There seem to be more younger women in the club now. And are you aware of the fact that women in the community now can be invited to become members if they have some association with the university, perhaps as a graduate of the university, but also have some "meaningful" experience of some significance in the community? It was recently announced--

Riess: Under Katherine Williams?

Van Horn: Yes, yes, very recently, under Katherine. I personally know of one such woman who was recently invited to become a member of the club who had graduated from the school of librarianship--now called the School of Library and Information Studies. If a woman has had some meaningful or significant experience, although it may be with another organization or institution or maybe in some professional sense for a certain period, at least three years--I don't know how they arrived at three years--she is eligible for consideration for membership.

Riess: When Norma and the committee were planning a different sort of layout for the living room, did you have in mind space for lectures and things like that?

Van Horn: I think it was just designed to give a little more uplift to the lounge, just for the club and the members per se. I don't recall that our committee thought about it being used for larger groups. At that time, the lounge was not used so frequently for luncheon parties. And now you never know if there's going to be a luncheon scheduled there. This is part of a money raising policy.

Riess: To let it be used?

Van Horn: Yes. And not only by campus groups, Mrs. Riess, but by outside unrelated groups. I know there is a so-called History Club, not one of the University Section clubs, which holds its session there. And I have acquaintances who will show up every now and then in the club at an afternoon card party. The groups do not have an obvious relationship to the campus, but maybe it's more so than I appreciate. Think of the weddings which have been held there! Making the club available for income purposes is a smart idea. But it probably has its limitations, because, as I understand from Maxine, sometimes the premises are not always treated with the greatest respect. This could become a problem.

7) The Cross-Section of Residents

Riess: Well, that really brings us very much up to the present. Are there any other people or stories or funny things about the club that you ought to tell me?

Van Horn: Well, perhaps an interesting little observation that I experienced while I was staying at the club for those two months. As you may know, there is always a continental breakfast available that is served between 7:00 a.m. and 8:00 a.m. in the private dining room. And you know its two tables put together are quite large, seating something like fourteen people. I would go down for breakfast. There might be just a trickle of guests, or maybe the table would be full, with quite a variety of guests.

While I was there, there were quite a number of men as guests in the club, for short periods of time, maybe a week, or a month, or even longer. And the cross-section was really fascinating. There was one, an engineer from India, a very

Van Horn: nice gentleman. Maybe I shouldn't observe this, but I remember at the time I felt, "I don't want to go to breakfast while Mr. So-and-So is there." I shouldn't have felt this way, but he made so much noise with his coffee, he slurped his coffee so, that I found it unpleasant and I didn't want to sit by him as might be necessary. But I thought, "What a trivial attitude to have." And I thought, "How often do these little things disturb people and condition their social response." It was because it was so intimate, you know. So I thought, "Well, you can at least rise above the irritation; it's just So-and-So slurping his coffee."

And then we had a very interesting Russian, Ajaz Adil Ogly Efendiev. He was a professor of chemical engineering from Baku in Azerbaijan--that we call "Azer-by-jan." But he informed me, "Mrs. van Horn, it is Azerbaijan." He was a young man, black-haired, big, overweight, really fat, rather what we would say a little overbearing in manner, but only because it was his exuberance, I think. He spoke English pretty well, with a very obvious heavy accent. We had met at breakfast and then we had some conversation a little later.

There is a lounge upstairs on the second floor with a television in it. Every morning after breakfast some of the men would go in to catch the news. I would sometimes go in to see what was happening as I didn't have a daily paper then. Pretty soon I noticed that the door would be closed and I would hear the men laughing. I opened the door once to go in, but there were so many of them I thought, "Well, there aren't enough chairs and somebody will have to give me his seat," so I excused myself.

Then another time it seemed to be vacant so I thought I'd pop in before anybody came. And in came Mr. Efendiev! He came bounding in--hope this never gets back to him--but he bounded in, turned the station on the TV without asking, went over to the window and threw it open, sat down, and lit a cigar. You know, this really annoyed me. I can't bear cigar smoke; it almost makes me sick. But I thought, "Never mind, now." Then he engaged me in conversation, and after a while I couldn't stand the smoke so I finally left.*

*At this point the interviewer was out of tape, but Mrs. van Horn went on to describe the guests at the Women's Faculty Club. At our request, she later wrote the material out, and we include it following.

Van Horn: Another time we met and he started to talk to me a bit. He understood there was some way he could find help with his English. There is an organization on campus for this purpose. Maybe you have heard of it: English In Action, associated with the University Y.W.C.A. On request, volunteers are available to meet with foreign visitors (usually scholars) on a one-to-one basis, on a more or less fixed schedule, for one hour a week.

As I am a member of this group, I volunteered to meet with Mr. Efendiev, after he had registered with the English In Action chairman--chairwoman--at the Y House. After he was "accepted" as a conversation partner, we met once a week in the morning at the Women's Faculty Club since we were both residents--not at Y House where meetings are usually held.

Our sessions were most interesting and stimulating, to me, certainly. He asked many questions about our governmental institutions, especially local, about our election process, tax system, etcetera, and we talked also about music, which we both agreed was the most universal form of communication. He brought me two classical recordings by Russian symphony orchestras, a Rimski-Korsakov and a Chopin.

He inquired a bit about myself, and showed considerable interest in my new home which, after two months of searching, finally materialized. I thought that it would be kind to invite him to see it. So one afternoon he came for tea, bringing another Russian record, Glasunow. He took off his coat, hung it carefully over the back of a chair, then took a quick tour of the flat, pronouncing it very attractive, even though I was scarcely settled. After serving him much coffee and cake, I played his record.

He then asked to see my record collection, pronouncing it "very good." It is so small, I had to laugh. Maybe he was just being polite. I happened to turn up a record of popular music: Hary Owens' Royal Hawaiian Band, and asked Mr. Efendiev if he was familiar with this kind of music. He was not, so I put it on the hi fi. It is charmingly lyrical in that special Hawaiian way, if you know it.

Suddenly Mr. Efendiev asked, "Mrs. van Horn, do you dance?" When I replied affirmatively, he said, "Let us tango." So, a little tentatively, I agreed, not knowing how much I might remember of tango steps. We started out dancing on the living room rug, but his tango turned out to be just a "one-step" or "two-step." To my surprise, he was a wonderful dancer, very light on his feet--as many fat men are said to be.

Van Horn: It was a delightful moment. Then he put on his coat, kissed my hand, saying, "Mrs. van Horn, I respect you very much. You are the most intelligent woman I have met"—which may not say much for his breadth of experience! As he is a member of the Communist Party (we talked of this a bit earlier), I wondered lightly what some conservative souls might have thought of such an episode! He gave me his address in Baku, and we have exchanged Christmas cards ever since. He was warmly expressive of the service and attention that he received at the Women's Faculty Club, and wrote also to Mrs. Rockwell and the "lovely ladies" of the club staff.

Other interesting little incidents took place at the club during my stay. An Australian professor of music, Manfred Clynes, would at times play the piano in the club lounge, really practising. As he was a strong player, I think that the sound was a little too much at times for some of the residents. He had given to me two cassette tapes of his recordings, Bach's Goldberg Variations and a Beethoven Sonata. Thinking that it would be nice to hear them, I arranged for them to be played one evening in the lounge, having borrowed a tape player from a visiting young Englishman staying in the club. The "concert" was attended by several guests, including Mr. Efendiev and a particularly interesting, well informed, and delightful professor of canon law from London University, Charles Duggan, who comes to the university each year for several months to carry on his research at Boalt Hall. He is often accompanied by his beautiful wife, who is also a professor. I don't recall her field precisely but think that it is rhetoric or literature.

Other foreign guests during my stay included visitors from Germany, Australia, India, Turkey, in addition to several faculty members from other, United States universities. A pretty young woman from India, a Ph.D. in Public Health, wore colorful saris, which carried an odor of camphor or such—slightly distracting if you sat by her at breakfast! She developed some transportation problems with which I was able to help her, so we had a very nice friendly exchange later. She called upon me in my room to say goodbye, bringing a little gift of Indian handcraft.

I might make just one more interesting comment on life in the club. It pertains to the use of the two kitchens on the second and third floors. These are nicely equipped kitchens, with refrigerators--and with printed instructions posted on the walls. I was aware that the kitchens were well used. In fact, I would often heat some milk for a late-night glass before I went to bed. The refrigerator would be packed tightly to Van Horn: the edges with food and containers. My carton of milk was always untouched. At times I smelled various dishes cooking, some odors not exactly recognizable. I am sure that some of our guests must have had to make ends meet at times by managing their own meals, or else American food left much to be desired and the need for a native dish was compelling. The provision of these facilities by the club must be greatly appreciated by all.

Interviewed in the Library of the Women's Faculty Club

1) A Career in University Administration

Riess: What is your background at this university?

Williams: I came in 1956 to the university simply because I was tired of volunteering my time and all that. I thought it would be interesting to do work with animals. Well, that's one way to look at it, because I got involved in the Registrar's Office [chuckles], as a typist clerk.

Certain promotions followed, and I was involved in space assignment, which was very new on campus, and I worked closely with the Building and Campus Development Committee, which later fell into disuse during all the upset and unrest on campus, and now again I gather is very active and serving a real purpose.

Riess: That was the committee that [Clark] Kerr started, and it included William Wurster, Thomas Church, and Louis de Monte?

Williams: Yes, and I'm trying to think of other names, but at the moment they escape me. And there was really an office for space assignment: we moved people, we shifted people, we did all kinds of things. That also was at the time when buildings were still being built on campus, so the decision had to be made, "Whose building was this to be and who's to go into it?" It was extremely interesting.

Then I fell into the position (which I later retained) of publishing the General Catalogue and having all that to-do which is very involved: assigning all the classes on campus, assigning all space, except office space. It just kind of grew like Topsy, and it was extremely interesting to watch the whole thing develop. I enjoyed every minute of it, up until about two years before I retired when things were not as interesting as they had been, or should be, and were not going to change. I retired in 1977.

Riess: What was your title when you retired?

Williams: Assistant registrar.

Riess: Do you think opportunities for advancement in the administration of the university are that good, or was it something about you?

Williams: It was very different then, really very different. The Personnel Office was not structured as it is today, and we didn't have the discriminatory laws--all of these things came later. I think department heads, people who were responsible for large departments such as the Registrar's Office and the Admissions Office--it was like running one's own business, so they got the best people they could. It wasn't a matter of interviewing forty-five people and then giving it to somebody who had earned it and was in the office and had the experience and so on. That I don't find of value. But again, I think it's a matter of timing, at least it was for me; I was just there at the right time and it was perfect.

Riess: And that's also a nice testimonial to being a slightly older woman coming back and looking for work.

Williams: That's right, yes. But it didn't occur to me at any point that there wasn't somewhere that I'd find something interesting. And that's why typist clerk didn't bother me; I've never been able to type, but they found other things for me to do. And once in a while somebody would say, "This needs to be typed," and then I would just kind of stand there. Dear Heaven, I've never met a typewriter that could spell! [laughs] But at any rate, yes, it was very different and I didn't care as long as I got out of the other. It was just too long--years on the Girl Scout board, years with Children's Home Society, charitable things and all. They still needed help, but my head wasn't fresh enough at that point to be of any value.

2) The Women's Faculty Club, 1971-1977

Riess: Who asked you to join the Women's Faculty Club, or what was your first awareness of the club?

Williams: I was aware of the club early on, because of course I came up here with my predecessor, and went to the Men's Faculty Club also. But at that time the membership requirement I guess was administrative assistant and at that point I was a principal clerk. And after I became an administrative assistant, because

- Williams: it had disturbed me a great deal that there was this limitation, I didn't make any effort to join. I really can't remember what spurred me on to join. But anyway, it was in 1971.
- Riess: Well, when you used to come up with your predecessor, what were your impressions of the club?
- Williams: It was very pleasant, oh yes, very different than it is now. There wasn't the vitality or the liveliness there is now, I suppose because there are so many more members and it is a more youthful group. I haven't really thought about it.
- Riess: But you would like to have joined if it had been open to you at that level you felt was appropriate?
- Williams: Well, yes, because I'd never been refused admittance to anything else. [laughs]
- Riess: After all, you'd been successful in the community all these years.
- Williams: Yes, it was strange. Well, there is a great deal of difference on any campus, not just this campus, between the academia and the administrative offices. This I sensed and disliked intensely. But again, I wish I could remember what it was that impelled me to join when I did.
- Riess: You don't think it was the invitation of somebody?
- Williams: It could have been, it could have been, and it's just left my mind.
- Riess: When you joined did you follow your pattern of being active?
- Williams: No, I just joined. It was after I retired that I became a member of the board.
- Riess: Not until 1977?
- Williams: 1977, right. Peg Uridge then invited me to become vice president, which we both agreed entailed nothing at all: no duties particularly unless--oh, just help with this and that. And then she was taken ill so suddenly in July of '78 and died in October of '78. There just was no way to avoid this situation of someone having to take over and take charge. There was no one else on the board that was retired and had the time to do it. Now I'm hoping to get the staff moving in such a way and things laid out in such a way that the standards are not relaxed and a president could be active on campus and still perform the duties of president.

Riess: When Mary Ann Johnson and I interviewed she pointed out that she was the first president who had not come from the academic side. And I guess since her time they've been from the administrative side.

Williams: I'm trying to think in terms of--well, Peg Uridge was Librarian, and that's an academic title, as far as I understand it. It's kind of an "iffy." But yes, I think you must be right.

Riess: Margaret Thal-Larsen and Mary Lou Norrie were faculty. And then Peg Uridge, and you.

When someone becomes president, they then appoint their vice president?

Williams: No, it's an election by the board. Peg Uridge simply asked if I would be willing to be vice president and I said "yes" and so it was then put to an election. The by-laws read that way, that the election is by a majority of the board.

Riess: During that period from 1971 to 1977, how involved were you in the merger?

Williams: Not at all, with the exception of attending an annual meeting and trying to find out what values there were in it.

Oh, I'll backtrack slightly. It was time to vote on this, on the merger, the 1976 vote, and Peg Uridge was president at the time, and I came to an annual meeting and I really couldn't get any answers to my quite direct questions. What I was doing was treading on a number of toes, I suspect. I really wanted an answer, I wanted to know what was behind it all one way or another, and I wasn't satisfactorily answered until we (the members) voted, and then due to some technicality in the law another vote had to be taken. At that time Josephine Smith sent the financial statement from the Men's Faculty Club along, so that we had access to this information. And of course that's why it was defeated.

Riess: For you there were obvious questions, and yet it was impossible to get the answers.

Williams: Well, people would answer me, but in their own way, and I didn't know these people well enough to interpret it. Now since I have some knowledge of what went on, I'm really very much surprised at those who were so much in favor of it though it would have been so detrimental to this club.

- Riess: Once you got the information you were against the merger?
- Williams: Oh yes! There was no question, and I think it changed many opinions because it was in cold print, how much in debt the Men's Faculty Club was and how they would use this club.
- Riess: When you were on the board, did the club feel divided, or was it united once it had made that decision?
- Williams: I didn't have any feeling of division, but I think it's because at that time I really didn't know many of these women very well. Since then, I realize that there must have been a feeling of division.
- Riess: Several resigned, fifteen I think.
- Williams: I don't know the number, but yes, several resigned. And I don't understand that.
- Riess: In the years since you've been president has the question of merger re-emerged?
- Williams: No, no.
- Riess: So it's really a dead issue now?
- Williams: Well, it is as far as we're concerned. And I think the reason that it's a dead issue is that when we started to move, the first thing that had to be done was to refurnish the rooms, to bring the rooms up to standard (and I'm afraid it was my standard). We just took off then and we haven't stopped since, and so nobody speaks of anything else, in terms of a merger or anything of the sort, to my knowledge.
- Riess: Because you don't need the merger.
- Williams: Right. We didn't ever need it.

3) Presidency, 1978, and Refurnishing the Rooms

- Riess: I'm interested in how you have taken the reins and yet dealt with the enormous sense of history. Many members would probably be happy just to get you off into the corner and tell you exactly how to do things.

Williams: Well, they've been most kind, most kind. They applaud everything we do, they're pleased with the way the club looks, it's the way that they always wanted it to look. We're not actually in a moneymaking situation, but we're certainly not in business to lose money. They all recognize this and see that this is really what they'd been aiming at.

No, I've had no such advisors. It may be that my own [laughing] effrontery in just coming in and doing may have had something to do with it.

Riess: You were certainly the new broom.

Williams: I just couldn't stand back and watch a place with such potential simply be mediocre. It's not my nature, although I didn't know that before. I see now it's followed a pattern throughout my life.

Have you ever visited any of the residential rooms? We've had them all painted and they are really beautiful. I've just bought fresh bedspreads and things like that. As I've said, checking through the rooms to see what was needed I found one bathmat, for instance, that somebody had kept putting down even though someone must have taken a bite out of one corner and there was a great bleach spot in the center of it. I just picked it up and threw it away. We don't need that kind of thing, and I for one wouldn't pay money for a room furnished in such a fashion!

Riess: Who should pick it up and throw it away? Maybe no maid ever conceived of the job that way.

Williams: I think now they might, because--you see this has really happened in a short time, when you consider the age of the club. And we have one maid now who has been here for some time; the one that we'd had, who'd been here for nearly ten years, left and her daughter took her place. Anna Philips's [the supervising maid] help is a student, a very fine young woman, but we need continuity there.

It's the same thing in the dining room. The students who have returned and who return to us year after year as long as they're in school see this kind of thing. They see a cracked cup and know that it goes out: it isn't used in service. Somebody else will not think about it, so that it takes a certain amount of time. Again, continuity is the answer.

Riess: The standards--the presidents in the past, I'm assuming, didn't see their job the way you see your job.

Williams: I think, really and truly Suzanne, that the real problem has been fear. The club went through such penny to penny days. Peg Uridge was a fine manager and did all the managing.

Riess: Even though she had a paid manager.

Williams: Right. She did the payrolls, she did the bills, she did the incoming and outgoing, anything that you can say or think of in an office, she did it.

Riess: She too was retired when she had the job.

Williams: Right. And of course this filled her days, and very happily. She couldn't have done anything else, it was her nature, and she built up a fine financial backlog. (But as you know, we are non-profit, so that we can only go so far on that kind of thing or the IRS gets after us. We haven't heard from them yet because we're doing enough maintenance work and rehabilitating of the club.) I feel very strongly that each president is capable of something; we all have areas, strengths, and that was Peg's, the money that she managed so beautifully.

When I came along it was really fairly simple--though we're still terribly careful--to go ahead and do these things. As a result prices could be raised. People come back year after year from abroad because this is the only place they want to stay, because we do take such care.

Riess: I'm sure it made a difference when the turnover in the residents became established. There was no need to do any rehabilitating when you had people bedded down year after year.

Williams: Forever, really. They furnished the rooms as they wished. It was treated at one point, very poorly I think, many years ago, as a ladies dormitory in a sense, and that's really not what it was meant to be. Now the by-laws limit it to, I think, two years of residency.

Riess: I get a vision of Lucy Stebbins saying "what it was meant to be." You believe in the history to that extent?

Williams: Oh, yes. To serve the campus community. I can't remember reading anywhere that it was meant as a home. I really can't. Have you read anything along that line?

Riess: No.

Williams: I haven't either. I think that it just simply evolved. These were all very strong-minded women, so who was to put them out and where were they to go?

4) An Active, Interested Board

Riess: It has been five years since you became a member of the board, and now president. What is the composition of your board? How do you work with the board?

Williams: It's a very active, interested board. We have board meetings every month and they're always very well attended. We're not having one in August because everybody's going on vacation in August and that's the first one missed, I guess--I'm not sure if they always had them in the summertime early on. But everyone speaks up.

Riess: People are on the board because they want to be on the board?

Williams: Oh yes. We've had one or two for whom it was a status thing, but they soon dropped out of their own volition. Non-attendance is just a waste of time for all of us.

Riess: Does the composition reflect the membership's sex and diversity?

Williams: There are eleven board members, including myself, and two are men. Tom [Thomas G.] Rosenmeyer has just retired from the board, simply because he's got a Guggenheim again and is going off to work on that. Daniel Heartz is joining us in September; John Fleming is from the Law School. We all find this mix very good, because women can get very bogged down on one little issue of, oh, maybe twenty-five cents to raise the price of something in the dining room. So we find it very refreshing, and I think that a third male would be a good idea--it's a good balance.

Riess: Do you think that the men bring out the best in the women?

Williams: Yes. Oh, yes. Because women traditionally have wanted to appear at their best, and so naturally this is what happens when you're using your head a little bit more. And it doesn't get into a gossipy, petty thing at all.

Riess: I wonder what being on a board with all those women brings out in the men?

Williams: [Laughing] Amusement! And sometimes a sense of, "What in the world could that have been about?"

Riess: Are the men from the academic side?

Williams: Oh, yes. They are both professors.

Riess: What is the balance between academic and non-academic women members? Do you have an idea?

Williams: I have those figures somewhere, but I can't locate them. I think the annual meeting minutes might give them to us. You see, we have far more men members now than we did a year ago this time.

Riess: Do you get non-academic men as members?

Williams: Oh yes, oh yes. I was just trying to think of the proportion and I can't really say. I would say there are fewer administrative than there are faculty because we must have all of Boalt Hall--probably because this is the only good food around. The School of Optometry--it's the same thing. I find it a very pleasant mix to come and go and greet members of both sexes.

Riess: How about the balance between academic and non-academic women on the board? Is that structured?

Williams: There is not a good balance. Doris Britt--she's from the School of Social Welfare, yes, and she's a field supervisor, so it's an academic title--but the rest are administrative. I'd like very much to break that up, but I find it is very difficult to get women faculty members on the board.

Josephine Miles has explained that to me. She's tried for a long time to organize seminars for women faculty members and in this way to introduce new women faculty members to the club and its advantages. Well, we don't have a great many social affairs; we have several a year, but they're not dances, they're simply pleasant gatherings for members. And she said that these younger women faculty members are very much involved in their jobs and generally have classes at lunchtime. They cannot attend these seminars or gatherings or meetings of such women. As a result they have no interest in serving on a board; they simply do not have the time or the energy. As far as coming up here for lunch, that's fine occasionally, but generally it's a brown bag lunch in their offices in between classes. So I really have had a difficult time with getting women faculty members to serve on the board.

Riess: Does Josephine Miles have any suggestions, or is she just explaining the situation?

Williams: We've both gone through this over and over again for two or three years now. It's strange, because it would seem that women could be proud of this club, faculty members.

Riess: Well, Marian Diamond, I think, is more active in the men's club now.

Williams: She is, but she's still a member here.

Riess: Has that been a pattern, now that the men's club is available to the academic women?

Williams: Not especially. Some, of course, have found activity there, but you see those are women who have already served their time here; they've either been president or they've been on the board or various committees or helped organize certain functions, and they really served their time here. I don't know whether there's more to it than that or not, whether it's more pleasurable with new faces and so on, or if in the academic structure there's a need to move in those circles.

5) Committee Support

Riess: Which are the important committees for you as a president? How much do you count on your committees?

Williams: I count on them a good deal--I like help. Often I have to go it alone because everybody else works. But there's the budget and finance committee, which is invaluable. Jerry [Jerome F.] Thomas is the chairman of that--he's a professor of sanitary engineering.

Riess: These are committees not necessarily from the board?

Williams: Well, there will be a board member, generally. Sally Senior is on that board as treasurer and I sit in. There are two or three other members. The library committee--Alice Davis, who's a board member, is in charge of that. She's gone through all the many books that we've had left to us and that has been quite a job. She passes on the ones that we can't use or have duplicates of, and she's arranged the library to much better advantage than it was before. She's sifted through and so on.

Williams: She will also be in charge of this picture taking business that I was saying about the garden. [Mrs. Williams refers to an album of photographs of the garden memorial areas, planned to be a companion to photographs of the club treasures.]

The house decorating committee has really and truly evolved into primarily Maxine Rockwell and myself. Again, who has the time to go through the rooms to do these things that have to be done?

Riess: That's what the house committee is?

Williams: Right, primarily. And then again, right or wrong, we've moved very rapidly on some of these things--if you can believe red plastic curtains in a residential room! It was necessary!

Riess: It's better not to be operating by committee on something like that.

Williams: Really, truly. For instance, Eleanor van Horn was in the other day and I was trying to get Lucy Stebbins's portrait out of the dining room, because that's been a source of great comment. Some members were bitter about that; they thought I had just put her behind the door. Well, it all comes down to Dean Davidson's portrait in the lounge, which I discovered was brought over here for safe-keeping in '76. I thought it belonged to the club, but I discovered that it is the same situation as Ida Sproul's portrait, which is in the vault, as you know, for safe-keeping.

When I-House [International House] builds a room, a Sproul room, they'll use the portrait, but it should be out of here, out of our responsibility. Dean Davidson too--both portraits came from their respective residence halls [Ida Sproul Hall and Davidson Hall] where they had been vandalized. There are members who feel that although Bobbie Davidson lived here for many years, she was not that important and should not be in the lounge. Well, there is no other wall big enough to put her on [laughs].

I felt very strongly that many of our members don't get into the lounge, they're in the dining room, and it seemed to me that Lucy Stebbins was just perfect in there on that white wall, and the lighting was perfect. We took her out of here [library] because this is now the Margaret Uridge Library. But I'm still getting letters.

Riess: Now she's out in the hall.

Williams: Yes. [Two months later both the Sproul and Davidson portraits were returned to the university, and Lucy Stebbins's portrait is at last in the lounge, and very handsome it is, too. KVV, 9/21/82]

When Eleanor van Horn was at lunch one day, and I was at my wits end, I said, "Eleanor, we've got to measure and put Lucy somewhere else." So we measured and it just fit. It's not really as it should be, but it's there [dining room, 7/21/81] and it's better. And I appreciated Margaret Murdock's reaction, "Oh, I so enjoy seeing Bobbie's smiling face in the morning."

Riess: Could you put Bobbie Davidson up in her old room and call it the Bobbie Davidson Room?

Williams: We've had that come up too. Florence Minard suggested that the rooms be named after various members, and I said that I felt that could be left to another president [laughs]. I'm not about to enter into that. Who makes the selection? We only have twenty-six rooms.

Riess: What does the budget committee handle?

Williams: They make up the budget for the coming year, and they then make recommendations, such as, "We should spend more money in this area," or, "We should raise more salaries," and so forth and so on. They use the quarterly reports that come in from our accountant. They work those over. The dining room, for instance, if it's not breaking even they then recommend that prices be raised. The board policy has been that the rooms will support the dining room. That's what we can do for our members, not raise prices so that they can't come to lunch. So it's--I mustn't say casual, but it's an advisory kind of thing.

Remember, when we started this we didn't have records. We didn't have a cook; we got all of our food from the dining commons. Now we've got salaries and we've got lots of things to look at that we didn't have before.

Riess: What are the other board committees that are important?

Williams: Well, membership.

Riess: Are there serious decisions about memberships? Do people who apply have to be screened?

Williams: No, no. I now see the reason, though I don't think it was entirely this, why no one below administrative assistant [was accepted]. In those days administrative assistant was a big title here on campus. We've had some people who couldn't, even as low as our dues are, they couldn't manage payment. They'd eat lunch all the time, and then suddenly here was this sizable bill. That was a pretty good reason for limiting it to people whose salaries were commensurate with the costs.

Now I would say we include Administrative Assistant II-- I'm not sure of the title now--but it seems reasonable that way, because senior clerks come and go and move and change and don't have the salary.

Riess: So is the membership committee a routine--?

Williams: Actually, there was a big conversation for a long time about how we could build up the membership. Well, we have not turned a hand. I sign a new application card every time I come in, and sometimes three, four and five. And I sign them only because Lotte's not here. Lotte Dadone is the chairman, and she signs the membership cards, but I'm here so much that it's just easier for me to do it than to bother Lotte--and they'd have to wait maybe for some time. They all come in, have lunch--"I've got to be a member!" [laughs] So they don't want to wait.

6) Management

Riess: What is the management structure here? How do the president and the board work with the management?

Williams: The board likes to think that it sets policy only, but it gets involved in a lot of other activities because I involve it in them. I feel that every board member should have a pretty good idea of what's going on here. At any rate, they set policy.

Then we have a manager, who is at present Mrs. Rockwell. We have a bookkeeper, Mrs. Waldburger, and Mrs. [Evelyn] Nichols, comes in and does payroll and accounts payable and receivable and all manner of things. Then of course we have Chikakó Pierce, who is on the desk where the telephone is answered and makes reservations and checks people out and checks people in and all that sort of thing. We have student help in the evening and on Saturdays and Sundays and holidays. And Mrs. Rockwell answers to the board.

Williams: Heretofore, Mrs. Uridge had a secretary, who at present is the night supervisor here, has a room, and she sat in on all the board meetings, and therefore reported everything to the staff about what needed to be done.

Riess: That was a chain of communication that had been set up by Peg Uridge.

Williams: Apparently, I saw no need for it because we had a manager, and you must understand that in those days--and this seems silly because it was only three or four years ago--she was paid something like $700 a month. Salaries were like that here. And again that extends from that fear of money, whether we would have enough.

Riess: That was the manager's salary, not the night manager's.

Williams: Right. The night manager doesn't have a salary. She works on campus, lives here. I had been president some time when I realized that in order to quell complaints about being over-worked (the understanding was that she would supervise activities that were going on here like weddings and receptions on the weekends), the board voted that she was to have at least a hundred dollars a month to offset this, and this to be tax-free and so forth. Which did what it was meant to.

We have a capable staff; all they needed was to be let do their jobs and given the reins. It took some time to get them to understand that it was all right to make a decision.

Riess: Does the manager herself attend the board meetings?

Williams: No, because the board then decided that there was no reason for the manager to have to take that much extra time out of a very busy day.

At one point we did meet from 5:30 on, and that we changed to the 4:30 to 6:30, because people could easily come here at that time. If people want to socialize they can do it after the board meeting. We have really very quick board meetings. The most I think we've ever gone to is maybe ten minutes to 7:00 p.m. Most people have had a busy day! We can resolve these things--we don't have to spend a whole night on them.

The board decided that Mrs. Rockwell and I could work together and that I would come to the board with things that Mrs. Rockwell felt were needed and that that was enough liaison. If I feel that something can be presented better by Mrs. Rockwell

Williams: I ask her to come, and she's always quite willing to. Or she can write a letter to the board, this kind of thing. From there, then, it filters on down.

Riess: Are there men in any of the management positions other than the waiters?

Williams: No. David Horn is our accountant, but he's his own man, he has his own business.

Riess: You said what a refreshing addition it was having men on the board; have you ever considered having men on the staff?

Williams: I guess we did try at one point. Not on the staff, but as a custodial thing. But you see we've only this year, in my estimation, reached a point with salaries that even a retired man might be interested in it. They were always so little.

Riess: Are they not on a scale commensurate with the rest of the university?

Williams: Now they are, but they weren't before, when you compare $700 to the salary of a residence hall manager, which I use as the equivalent on campus.

Riess: I guess maybe there's a history of people, like Margaret Murdock, almost volunteering their time, just saying, "Well, I'll do it."

Williams: That's exactly what people did, I think, because there was really a need. I know that you heard, as I heard last year for the first time, that at one point there was so little interest shown in the club that it was going to be sold to the university. They were going to take it over and use it as library carrels. Unbelievable! And somebody stepped in--it was Florence Minard who finally got the word out. "This is what's happening." Isn't it interesting that there's always some individual who comes along at the right time. Again, I insist that it's all timing.

Riess: But it all seems a little bit brinksman-like; it's only at the crisis point that that person stands up.

Williams: Yes, yes. And that's exactly what I want to keep the club from now. It's important that it just move of its own momentum.

7) The Kitchen

Riess: What has been the evolution of the kitchen in the years that you've been here?

Williams: I can only really tell you about these years because before I gather there was a manager and his wife and they did the cooking and so forth and so on.

Riess: Actually he didn't do the cooking. There was a famous "Katy" who did the cooking, Katy who made the wonderful popovers and roast beef.

Williams: [laughs] Yes, I'll be interested in reading this in these oral histories.

When I came into it there was a Mrs. Lee--all I can think of is her nickname, which was Midge--and she had done this kind of thing in the public school. She was about five foot tall and energy you can't believe! A charming woman, and she acted as a hostess, in a sense, in the dining room. She would take the food that was brought over from the dining commons and add parsley, add chives, decorate it in some way so that the presentation was much more pleasing--although the food was quite mediocre, because the dining commons is that way.

Riess: This is the dining commons which was on the bottom floor of the Student Union?

Williams: That's right. And so we struggled along that way for a while, gradually buying things elsewhere to fill in, to make it more attractive and better tasting. Then we decided to go all out and get a cook. Alice Boschan, who had been with the dining commons, came in to cook.

Riess: When was that?

Williams: It would have been about two years ago last December, probably '79.

She made salads, and more and more we drew away from the dining commons--they were very arbitrary, very arrogant, about what we could have and couldn't have. Amazingly enough, I reacted to that in a very different way than they expected. We found we were buying our own meat, because they were sending us roast beef--it was another cut of beef that was sliced, but Williams: it wasn't what we call roast beef. So all this time we were gradually bringing standards up and up until finally we just simply closed our arrangement with the dining commons.

Then we experimented with deliveries from Berkeley Market, but they stopped delivering. Now, Mrs. Rockwell and Mrs. Nichols take turns picking the desserts up from Neldam's. Dreyer's delivers (and I don't remember what kind of ice cream it was before that). But in all of this too there's been development in the kitchen. We now have an absolutely fantastic stove. I don't know whether you've ever seen it. But that was an experience! If you've ever shopped for a stove like that, these great, great monsters, absolutely stunning, from somewhere out in Hayward or San Leandro, somewhere on the waterfront.

Then Mrs. Boschan had a very unfortunate accident; she and her husband were driving on Arlington Avenue and somehow or other he lost control of the car and it flipped over that big embankment. Happily, neither one of them was hurt--it was really miraculous--except Alice had a back and neck problem.

Lori Gallo, who filled in and worked with Mrs. Boschan, took over absolutely beautifully in between her classes. Then we got another part-time worker--I think Faye had worked with the dining commons. She works four or five hours (she only wants so much time you see), and she of course is invaluable.

About Christmas time, Mrs. Boschan decided that she just couldn't do it anymore because it would be a matter of being here and then not being here for two days, this kind of thing--it really was very unfortunate for them. But in the meantime--as usual our perfect timing--Julienne LeBlanc came from the East Coast to be with her parents and grandparents here in Berkeley and she, of course, with her professional background, was ideal.

Riess: You had advertised the job?

Williams: No, we never seem to advertise. Just suddenly by word of mouth here she was, available. She came in and took over and hasn't stopped since. We now have new refrigeration, which we had to have before we could even go for an alcoholic license. [laughs] That's a free phrase, "alcoholic license."

Riess: Liquor license.

Williams: Club license is what it's called.

- Riess: In the history, Mr. Abbo was a believer in offering a little something before dinner. I think that was all right if it was being given to the members; it just couldn't be sold without a license. How has liquor been handled since then?
- Williams: The same way. When we've had luncheons, new members' luncheons, you'll find that champagne is served at 11:30 a.m., or even earlier, as the ladies get here. That is not part of the price of the meal, because we cannot sell it. I've considered it simply part of our getting to know one another, the warmth and enjoyment of the occasion. Heretofore I think it had always been sherry, but I find sherry very heavy. That's the way it's been handled. Of course anyone could bring a bottle of wine in to serve to luncheon guests. We will be serving only wine and beer. We have no desire to have a bar; I don't even want to be part of that. I don't see where it could be appropriately placed.
- Riess: Wine and beer would be just fine.
- Williams: Well, this club license includes hard liquor also, but that will be ideal because caterers sometimes require that, or parties for some--such wish to have it. So now we have to get involved with wine distributors and beer distributors and so forth. I think what we'll do is have a house wine and sell by carafe or individual glass, and probably have champagne available to anyone who'd like--Mrs. Gordon-Britland was having a group today and a bottle of champagne might have been a very pleasant sort of thing. So that's what we have in mind. But I had no idea we'd have this billboard [public notice of intention to sell liquor] on the front door [laughs].
- Riess: Do you expect anyone to object?
- Williams: I've had no objections. I've heard nothing. In fact, the day we were putting it up people were coming into lunch and said, "Ah, we can have a glass of wine in thirty days." Something of this sort.
- Riess: Is the license an expensive outlay?
- Williams: No, a club license is only $336 dollars.
- You have no idea what that experience was like. You think about bureaucracies around here, you should go down there sometime and see what you're up against. [laughs] "Would you 'girls' come over here and sit down," that sort of thing.
- Riess: [laughing] Girls! Golly!

8) The Gardens

Riess: You mentioned excavations that have to be done because of this long-term problem of flooding and damage and we talked a bit about the gardener and that kind of responsibility--I can see why anyone who wasn't retired couldn't take over the presidency. What are you going to try to do about that?

Williams: Well, I had considered, and in fact I talked to Josephine Miles about a search committee, a group of people, maybe five or six, who could just go through campus and see what they could find in the way of a replacement.

Riess: There's no one on the board currently?

Williams: Well, Lotte Dadone is retired and she has accepted the vice-presidency. Tom Rosenmeyer was vice president and has since retired from the board, as I had mentioned. It could be that Lotte might take that on, but I do know that they're considering buying some property up Benicia way, and that's quite a little distance to come. But again, if the place is running the way it should, then it might not require this kind of time.

Riess: Why don't you want to do it forever?

Williams: [laughs]

Riess: Now that you've got it working beautifully, don't you want to enjoy the pleasure?

Williams: Well, I do, but I have this thing about the day I'll hear somebody say, "Why doesn't she give somebody else a chance?"

Riess: Why don't you say a few things about the garden. I know it's something of interest to you.

Williams: There are many members who at one time or another in their lives donate or leave money to the club, or artifacts of some value or great value--witness the Oriental rugs. We've almost completed the restoration of the club (or rehabilitated it, however one wishes to term it), so that when checks for memorials to certain individuals came in I'd think, "I don't really want to put that money into saying Mrs. So-and-So recovered the sofa in the name of So-and-So." It didn't seem appropriate.

In looking about and also kind of looking out to see where we could get cut flowers, which I think are part of the club, again we go to timing. At that moment Joanna Kaufmann

Williams: became landscape architect, and she's very much into this sort of thing and there was an immediate rapport and it all opened up into some beautiful future plans. It occurred to me at lunch one day that that [memorial garden gifts] would be an ideal way to do it, because most people I know love gardens. Maybe they're not gardeners themselves, but it's a living sort of thing.

I put it in the next newsletter that after having checked with a few people about it that we thought this is what we would do. And it's been received with great enthusiasm, really, because I think there are lots of charities to give to but, well, people who really love this club feel very close to it. They like to have that sense of still being active, of doing something for the club and in the name of a friend. So the garden has been quite successful.

Our new rose garden--almost every other day there can be a bouquet out of that. That's just the beginning now. Eventually we will have pictures and names of donors and so on, and I think we can just kind of keep going at it. And did I tell you about the two crab apple trees that were planted that were individual gifts?

Riess: No. How will the white flower garden enter into this?

Williams: There are lots of whites, with the white agapanthus and the white delphiniums and foxgloves and so forth up in the east corner. The semi-circle in the front will be really very formal. The Japanese anemones will be transplanted around because they really are so delightful and useful.

The change will start where the ivy is, because that's really taken over. The Japanese magnolias need to have something less high and weedy around them because they're so handsome in themselves. But all the ferns will remain as they are because they're used by campus classes. Apparently this is the only place where some of them appear. We will again use the white campanula; over where the ivy is the campanula will be planted to drop over the walls. The plans are downstairs, so I can show them to you if you'd like.

Riess: Why do you have such an excellent collection of ferns? Did old members do that?

Williams: I have a feeling that much of this garden was planted when Ben, the gardener, would see an empty spot and he'd bring us something that was to be thrown out or pulled up.

Riess: He also works at University House, or used to?

Williams: Right, yes. I guess they must all have access to something there, because for a long time he planted little petunias here in the front that he'd get from somewhere, which was much appreciated. I suspect that's how the ferns came. And then, you know, lots of things are planted by birds and the wind, lots of things. I can't say really. But it will be handsome when it's done.

The hedge you may have noticed is really quite in need of trimming, but we're letting it get higher than the automobiles so that it will block that out. I also have this strange feeling that hedges don't have to go downhill; they don't need to follow the contour of the land but can go straight across. So this is what we're doing. Then on the east side all that parking up there won't be visible from the dining room. It'll take a little while, but by degrees it's coming nicely. We hope to add more azaleas and rhododendron in the rear garden. I'd like to see the club reach a point with its garden that cut flowers could come all year round from our own garden.

Riess: Who cuts the flowers?

Williams: It's kind of a joint affair. When I come in and there's been absolutely no free time for anyone to do it, then I do it. Mrs. Waldburger is now back from her extended vacation and so she did it this week and it hasn't been necessary for me to take it on. Evelyn Nichols enjoys it too, and I think that's a nice break for them. You know they're here in the club all day long: they eat lunch here.

Riess: I would think being allowed to go out and pick a flower would be a godsend.

Williams: Exactly. I know I've said, "At lunchtime, why don't you go somewhere else?" Two of them went to the Men's Faculty Club for luncheon one day and came back and said, "Thank you very much, but no thank you." Lunch is included in salaries for these people, so there really is another benefit--as it is included for students.

Riess: Yours is not a salaried position is it?

Williams: No, no. Though the board said that I should have gas mileage and so forth. But I've never felt that way. It's really very pleasant and I enjoy it. I finally agreed to it, but I interpret

Williams: it this way: if I'm working here, as I will be all of this week, then the club can pick up my luncheon check, that's fine. But if I'm socializing, then that's my affair. So I'm the one who makes the differentiation. That's why when Betsy asked me what I was doing today I said, "Working!" [laughs]

I mean, how do you figure things like that? And I do so much at home on the telephone. And it is minor in a way. Someone said, "Well, your telephone." I thought, what percentage would you take off, how would you work this out? I don't find that necessary.

Riess: Your taste and your thoughts about the hedge and how things should look, I think it is difficult to hand that on to the next president or to figure out a way to make it in perpetuity.

Williams: I don't think you can, I don't think so. A woman of Lotte's calibre will carry it on--there's no question--but if there is somebody who's working full-time and can't give it the attention, and then the staff changes, then you could have problems again.

Riess: It might be good to have some of those committees stronger. Is there a garden committee?

Williams: No. I've hesitated about that. Joanna is a professional and she's a club member also. It took us a couple of meetings before she realized that I did know what a flower was. So I can't think it would be very good to have people bringing plants down or suggesting things to her. Though I must say we're freer about that because we are paying for this now. The university can't at this point. And I'd much rather that they pay for the excavation work which they will have to do and pay for, and which has to be done, than the garden. I mean, I don't care a bit about finding the rocks that go under those trenches.

Riess: What is the arrangement?

Williams: Well, you see part of the agreement with the Regents is that they take care of the exterior, the grounds and gardens. Now, nobody had looked at this garden in, oh, I suppose, ten or fifteen years maybe. I talked to [Fred] Warnke about it and he came up and I was telling him things that I thought should be done. You see, we do have weddings here and they love to use the deck and the brick terrace, and if it's nothing but weeds, even though they're mowed, it's not a good idea.

Williams: How we got into it is that Mr. [Ari] Inouye who was the campus architect and who is absolutely a marvelous man, had retired, and Joanna had recently graduated, maybe two or three years ago, from landscape architecture here. She came up and we talked and she was so enthusiastic. She's a live-wire and a beautiful woman.

She came back with this handsome plan, but it was really within reason. It wasn't a great fountain and all that sort of thing. In fact, we're following it. They did the rose garden, and I guess the university did pay for that--the labor and the plants and the removal of two trees that we were always afraid were going to fall over onto somebody, they'd been there so many years. Then, that's when the freeze was announced, that they could spend no more money until further notice. That's when I began to think about this and that's when the whole thing worked out with the memorials and so forth.

Riess: So, you can have her services, but as far as materials and labor--

Williams: Unless there's a turnabout and the university can see its way clear to providing some of these things, but really I find no difficulty in helping the university out.

9) Club Finances

Riess: Do you feel free to get money from outside sources? Can you work that way, or does your money have to come in through the development office?

Williams: We don't get money from anywhere except the members.

Riess: If you wanted to develop your garden you might very well look to a potential outside donor and make a plea, say, "We feel that you're someone who could appreciate this space like we do and we'd like to, etcetera."

Williams: That's not my style at all. I can't see any need for it in the first place, I really can't. We can only develop this to such a degree. There are those who find it handier to pick up plants here than they might at a nursery.

Riess: [laughing] I hope our readers will understand what you've just said.

Williams: Well, we had a very handsome ceramic pot--good-looking, not of great value but it was a lovely soft green--and it was planted with a lovely white tree azalea, and the first football game last season it disappeared from the entry.

Riess: So that restrains your ardor.

Williams: Oh absolutely! But then the other thing is that there is just so much money that the club can absorb before it is seen as a profit-making operation.

What we consider which is important is the maintenance of the club. Salaries are very important in my estimation. If people are not rewarded for what they are doing--everyone who works here is gung ho and all in favor of the club--there's something wrong with the management. So we've got places to put any profit.

It's not possible to get an answer from the IRS as to how much money a non-profit organization can have before it hits the danger point. I have to be very careful that we are in the right investment areas, which are treasury bonds, government backed, there's no question. I'd like to see us reach a nice, comfortable point. I don't even know what the figure would be so that we have a nice, tidy backlog. We have one now but I think it could be more.

Riess: Who is in charge of those investments?

Williams: The board.

Riess: You come to the board with recommendations?

Williams: Yes. I try very hard at board meetings, as Mary Ann said, not to state my own opinions. But I'm afraid everything I say or think shows on my face, so I'm not awfully successful at that. There are enough very shrewd women on the board, let alone the men, so that the investments are well-considered.

Riess: So that's part of the monthly meetings, talking about the investments?

Williams: Yes, or where they are and so forth and so on.

Riess: There was a time, back in the sixties, when fund raising was a responsibility, tea parties and minor fund raising. I wondered whether there were some restrictions on the club's freedom to go and look for funds.

Williams: I don't know whether there would be restrictions, that we'd have to go through the Development Office and so on. Actually, I think the best fund raising is a good dining room.

What has grown--and again we come back to the dining room and the general atmosphere of the club--there are groups in University Hall that will only meet here. The Chancellor's Office will only meet here. We try very hard to restrict the lounge to--I'd like to reach the point where we don't serve luncheon in there at all. The rugs, everything, show the effect. And yet there are groups of forty or so that just have to meet there. So, what is there to be done?

But that kind of thing, departmental meetings--yes, I think it's increased. I know it's the food, because they stay here for lunch, they don't break the meeting and go somewhere else.

Riess: They pay a fee to use it for a meeting?

Williams: Yes, they pay a fee if it's only a meeting. If they're having lunch here then that's another story. And Maxine makes that determination because there are many ins and outs: do we serve coffee? Do they want sweet rolls? Oh, it gets very involved.

10. Future Plans

Riess: Do you think that the club will expand its physical facilities ever?

Williams: Oh, I don't know about "ever."

Riess: Is there a master plan for the club to burst through one of the walls?

Williams: No. Actually, I think it's very manageable the way it is. So often with expansion it leads to disaster. We're expanding our breakfast service. It's been a continental breakfast and then toast is available and fruit maybe--I guess not even that much. But the continental breakfast is included in the room rate. Now we're going to have a chef in the kitchen, and dining room service. There will be fruits in season, all kinds of cereals, breads, hot breads and so on.

Riess: From your kitchen or would that be from Neldam's?

Williams: No, our kitchen. That's another point that I want to reach, where the desserts are all made here. I don't see any reason why not. The place is not that big. That's why I think it can be just a jewel and stay the size it is.

Then also, I think it would be fun to try and open that dining room breakfast to members.

Riess: I think that morning breakfast meetings would also be very attractive to a lot of the departments.

Williams: I think so. Here we go again.

Riess: The ideas I'm sure just sort of gallop off on their own.

Williams: They do. And it's interesting: mention it to somebody and they take it off in another direction.

Riess: Can you make any interesting comparisons to the kind of volunteer work you were doing up until 1956, working with women then, and working in this situation with the women now?

Williams: It's very different, from the standpoint that all of us were homemakers, no one worked, it was all volunteer work we were doing. Our children all knew one another, all went to the same schools. It was a closed society really, and eventually quite dull, though we didn't realize it, I don't suppose, until on stepping out that made a difference.

Riess: It was dull because the same characters--

Williams: The characters never changed. And if someone introduced something and it wasn't generally accepted, then it was in a sense taboo. That's why I found the university such marvelous joy, because of the youthfulness around and the stimulating thinking and the changes. Oh yes, it was very different. But at least to me in its time it had its own value certainly. Another life however; I look back and it looks very different.

Riess: Why did you think we should have an oral history of the Women's Faculty Club?

Williams: [laughs] Well, simply because so often this sort of thing is let go too long and those that have that information are gone and there is just no way to retrieve it.

Riess: Was there some impetus in the last year and a half?

Williams: The more that I talked to people, and then my own family experience, brought me to this realization early on and then it was simply applied here. And then of course this was almost more interesting because of the varied personalities involved. I think it's very important, and I think it should be picked up again in--is ten years too soon, or fifteen?

Riess: What else could possibly happen, President Williams? [laughs]

Williams: You don't think so? I think lots more could happen.

Riess: I feel that the club's really been through everything.

Williams: Oh, no. One of my dreams, and it may be that that might be the one thing that would let me continue on, is that I think we should serve dinner eventually. I had hoped to start that this fall, but in talking to Julianne and Maxine I realized that we hadn't started to advertise for a chef in time, because there has to be an assistant chef at least. Julianne will surely be in charge of the kitchen still, but we would need someone to come in at two or three o'clock if dinner's served from five to seven o'clock. We have to have dishwashers, we have to have waiters. You know the whole rigamarole is repeated again, really. We're just not quite ready for that yet. I think the market's out here, I really do.

We have to be really innovative about it because it will only duplicate lunch otherwise. We want to avoid that, and we won't have a salad bar. But then there's the question, "Do you have any choice of entrees?" Do you perhaps have two? Do you include soup and salad or do you have it all a la carte? Oh, the questions!

What really started this in my head was the residents. In the wintertime--and you know we really have a short space of dark time here, when it's dark from five o'clock on, but still--there's no place for these people to go. We have kitchens, one on the second floor and one on the third floor, for maybe making toast, or heating a little soup or something, but not for cooking.

Most residents have cookies or this or that in their rooms, or they go over to the Men's Faculty Club. I think most residents here eat lunch, an entree, and then dinner is rather slim. I know it would be a convenience to them to have the dining room open. So, do we open it only to residents, do we open it only to members? All of these things have to be settled.

Riess: I can imagine how some of the people who've gone through the history of closing the dining room might begin to blanch at the very idea.

Williams: Actually, I didn't have any negative responses. I talked to people around and about in the club membership and heard, "Oh, that would be marvelous." There are lots of women who do not want to be out at night, so we could be here at five, have a pleasant dinner, and still get home at a decent hour.

Also, thinking in terms of Hertz Hall and Zellerbach, people could have dinner here and then stroll down. They might park down there and walk up, so then their cars are there. There are all kinds of possibilities for this.

Riess: Why didn't it support itself in the past?

Williams: Because it was not good enough. That's about all I can say. Also, the membership was much less.

Riess: But primarily you would say it was not good enough.

Williams: I would say so. And I shouldn't, because I didn't experience the times when the people were all here who were doing such fancy things, at least the ones I've heard about.

Riess: That would tempt you to stay on.

Williams: I'd feel terribly responsible. As I told Julianne, I wouldn't be averse at all that if it didn't go over, except for the residents, that we would just close it to members and have it for residents only. Then I realized she's quite young and she's only been here since January and that she just couldn't face it if it didn't go. So we have to have the right assistant chef. We could start it the first of the year. I don't know. This may all develop and I'm willing to wait and see what happens.

Riess: Have you brought it up before the board?

Williams: Oh, yes! They've known--you see this board, we probably operate very differently from most boards, and they really know everything that goes on here. Sometimes they'll say, or John will Williams: say, "I thought we were just policy setting advisors," and I'll say, "John, we have got to know what's going on, that's all." We've had some pilferage problems and so on and they have got to know what's going on here; I have got to use their heads too, which I don't think is unreasonable.

THE CLUB ORGANIZATION AND MEMBERSHIP

The Women's Faculty Club was organized September 29, 1919. Its active membership averaging ninety-five persons comprises only women holding Regent appointments at the University of California. An equal number of associate members is chosen from women throughout the state who have made some definite contribution in professional, educational, social, literary, or artistic fields.

THE BUILDING COMMITTEE OF THE WOMEN'S FACULTY CLUB, Inc.

The Building Committee was nominated by the Board of Directors of Women's Faculty Club and elected by the club. It was incorporated September 1920, under the laws of the State of California as a non-profit making corporation "whose sole function shall be to build and equip a club house for the sole purpose of selling this club house to the Women's Faculty Club at cost or less than cost and without any profit whatsoever to this corporation." It has a paid-up membership subscription amounting to $10,000.00. Membership in the Women's Faculty Club carries with it membership in the Building Committee of the Women's Faculty Club, Inc., by virtue of one share of stock purchased as initiation fee.

PURPOSE OF THE ISSUE

The proceeds of these bonds, which are the direct obligation of the Building Committee, will be used to construct and equip a club house to provide living accommodations and a social meeting place for the women of the faculty of State University and for the associate members of the club.

LOCATION

The Regents of the University have granted to the Women's Faculty Club, free, a beautiful and picturesque site on the campus, near the College Avenue entrance, within one block of the street car lines, and within three minutes walk of the principal college buildings. A plan of the lot and its location is shown on attached sheet.

THE BUILDING

The plan of the house, as the accompanying sketch indicates, presents a three-story building with a high basement, to be carried out in stucco. The lower floor will contain dining rooms, kitchen, storage rooms, and a janitor's apartment. The first floor is to be devoted to social quarters for the club, namely: lounge, living room, writing room, library, committee room. It will also include dressing room facilities, and an apartment for the manager. The second and third floors comprise twenty-six living rooms with an adequate number of bathrooms, shower baths and sleeping porches. Service rooms for general use are to be installed on each floor. The dining room will offer restaurant facilities and is to be operated on a financially independent basis.

SECURITY

The land upon which the club house is situated remains the property of the University. The property of the Women's Faculty Club and its Building Committee consists in the club house and its equipment. Interest and sinking fund will be derived from rentals of living quarters and dining room, and from club dues and fees. Adequate insurance against fire will be provided.

TENANTS

The Women's Faculty Club is pledged to purchase from its Building Committee "the club house and its equipment on a deferred payment purchase plan for a period not to exceed the actual cost of the club house and its equipment." Until the purchase is consummated the Women's Faculty Club agrees to lease the club house from the Building Committee for an amount equivalent to the semi-annual payments to be devoted to the sinking fund and interest. This amount will automatically reduce the purchase price of the club house by so much each year, so that when the bonded indebtedness is amortized the club will be in complete ownership of the club house.

The Women's Faculty Club will, in turn, sublet the living quarters to its members.

INCREASING MEMBERSHIP

Such a club house on the University campus will provide urgently needed living facilities for the women of the faculty. The unique position occupied by the Women's Faculty Club as a social club attached to the State University assures of a permanent and increasing membership.

In order to provide a sinking fund for the retirement of the bonds, the Building Committee of the Women's Faculty Club, Inc., has agreed to set aside semi-annually a sum of $2000, applicable to principal and interest, said sum to be derived from rental paid by the Women's Faculty Club as aforesaid.

The following is a conservative estimate of the yearly earnings and expenditures of the club house as planned.

EXPENDITURES

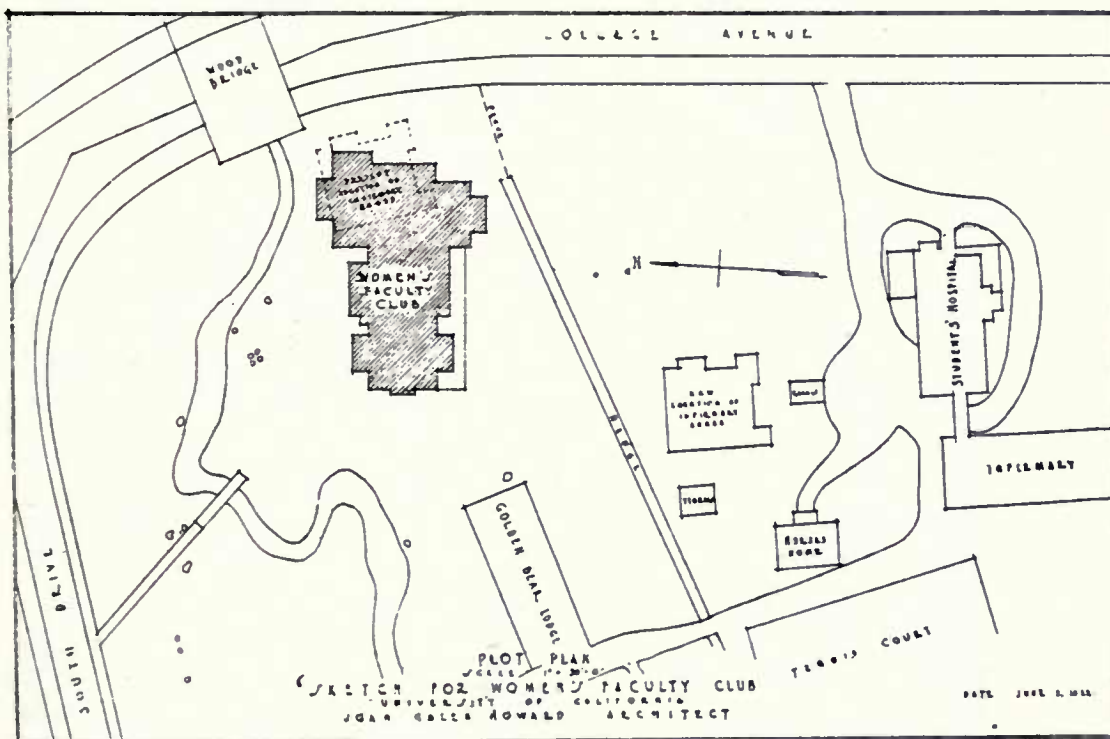

Club service (exclusive of dining room)	$3,000.00
Lights	600.00
Water	350.00
Telephone	500.00
General Expenses (laundry, etc.)	1,400.00
Depreciation	1,000.00
Insurance and Taxes	260.00
Club expenses	700.00 ✓
	$7,810.00

EARNINGS

Rentals, living quarters and dining room	$10,920.00
Dues and fees	2,000.00
	$12,920.00

SINKING FUND AND INTEREST, $4,000.00

NET INCOME, $5,110.00

The Oakland Bank (formerly The Oakland Bank of Savings), Twelfth Street and Broadway, Oakland California, as paying agent in all transactions connected with these bonds. The interest on the bonds will be payable semi-annually on June 15 and December 15, at the main office of The Oakland Bank.

The bonds are on sale at the BERKELEY COMMERCIAL AND SAVINGS BANK, northeast corner Twelfth Street and Shattuck Avenue, Berkeley, California.

Wash Day in the "Old" basement - —

259

-- This is the day we wash our clothes - yes - it was washday - but not by turning a switch on a modern washer-dryer - -- no - in the basement we had 2 tubs -- one for washing -- one for rinsing -- even a wash board - was "provided" for those "nasty" spots - for an extra scrub.
Then the clothes were rung out by hand - and put into tub #2 - for rinsing -- then put into a hamper - and carried over to the opposite side of the basement - and hung over wire lines to dry - The clothespins were always left on the lines so anyone could use them.

The clothes most always dried "over night" -

* * * * *

I first met Mrs. McLaughlin in 1963, when she was in Berkeley on what she called her annual vacation -- auditing courses in world affairs at the University of California Summer Session. Although we shared several old friends in common, I am sure we would not have met on that sunny summer afternoon had not Margaret Murdock* of the Women's Faculty Club virtually forced me to speak to her.

Of course, I had long heard of her, and at the Women's Faculty Club I was frequently told of the San Francisco civic leader who almost every summer registered for classes and assiduously read the assignments. As she later observed to me, if one lumped together the summers she had spent at Mills College and at Berkeley, one would see that she had the longest sustained record of summer schooling of any University of California alumna. Compared with that extended beadroll, my own annual visits were too trifling to mention, for I had been returning to my native state only since 1957. I always stayed at the Women's Faculty Club and went every day to the Bancroft Library, where I read in the collections connected with the Progressive period and Progressive Party in California. Every summer Miss Murdock regularly urged me to introduce myself to Mrs. McLaughlin; she was certain that if Mrs. McLaughlin would talk to me, my research would be notably enriched.

But I never followed this sensible suggestion because (and I am ashamed to admit it) I was intimidated. I remember particularly the occasions when Mrs. McLaughlin came for dinner with her old friend Dean Mary B. Davidson (always "Bobby" when Mrs. McLaughlin spoke of her). She walked into the dining room with a rather slow and measured step and while she traversed the room and after she was seated, half the dining room seemed to leave its collective seat and dart over to speak to her. Invariably several of the University's ancient and honorable arrived for their own dinners, and they too seemed to find it necessary to circle her table and stop and chat before they sat down to their own soup. There was always a great deal of laughter and banter and conversation over in that corner. I used to wonder if she didn't leave the table in a state of ravenous hunger because she had to stop and talk with so many old friends.

*Margaret Murdock: daughter of Charles Murdock, the San Francisco printer, man of letters, reformer, and staunch Unitarian. Miss Murdock graduated from the University and for many years has been associated with the University in various capacities.

On the other hand, if one crossed her path when she was by herself, she could seem remote and stern to those she didn't know -- partly, perhaps, because she was abstracted and partly because of her habit of unsmilingly looking over her glasses to see who was coming. This long, hard look over the glasses, with the head down and those clear blue eyes seeming to look through me -- this I found both unsettling and intimidating; and I was greatly relieved to learn that other friends had been similarly affected. How mistaken we all were!

So my avoidance of Mrs. McLaughlin went on for about three years, until one morning in August 1963 when Miss Murdock cornered me: Mrs. McLaughlin she reported, would be staying at the Women's Faculty Club; she (Miss Murdock) had previously asked me to go and see Mrs. McLaughlin, and I had not done so; now she (Miss Murdock) had told Mrs. McLaughlin that I wanted to ask her some questions; Mrs. McLaughlin doubted that she had much helpful information, but I must go and introduce myself. In a hangdog way I promised to do so, but I had an inkling that I was not going to make a point of pounding on Mrs. McLaughlin's door.

About a week later I came back to the Women's Faculty Club for a very late lunch -- one of those scattered, last minute forays where one dashed into the empty dining room and, while the student help cleared the other tables, gobbled as fast as possible a plateful of assorted leftovers. As I was standing at the serving table contemplating the tepid possibilities a second latecomer walked in, picked up a plate, and silently stood behind me; and I, hastily looking over my shoulder, nearly dropped my butter plate as I saw that I was hedged in by strawberry jello salad on one side and Mrs. McLaughlin on the other and that in that constricted space I could not cravenly scuttle away. Undoubtedly I stuttered some inconsequential inanity because Mrs. McLaughlin looked at me not through her glasses but over them, at the same time saying, "Yesss?" and giving an impression of such remarkable sternness that I squeaked, "Margaret Murdock said that I should ask you" This trailing-away sentence I never did complete because Mrs. McLaughlin smiled, looked at me through her glasses (oh, the dramatic change!) and with charming directness replied, "So it's you! Why of course! I've been expecting you. I don't know how much I can help because at that time I didn't know many of those people. But let's talk."

So we sat down and as we ate we talked, and after a while the manager asked us if we'd mind moving because the dining room had been closed. We moved out to the porch where the sunshine was pouring down, and there we sat looking down on the "Old Berkeley" garden -- the fuchsias, the acanthus, the roses in profusion, the green lawn, the hedge, and the scent of bay leaves, somehow mixed up in all of it -- while Mrs. McLaughlin reminisced about her growing up in San Francisco and Nevada in the '80s and '90s, and about William Kent and Hiram Johnson and briefly about Chester Rowell, each of us deeply absorbed. Suddenly we heard the chimes striking four and she exclaimed that she was forty minutes late for an engagement. When we said a rushed goodbye she remarked that it was unlikely that she would be back the next day, but we would surely meet later in the week.

The next morning I was in the breakfastroom foggily contemplating the San Francisco Chronicle with one eye and a cup of coffee with the other, when I walked Mrs. McLaughlin. She had eaten breakfast (I learned that she always woke up at six o'clock and listened to a summary world events on her radio) but she wanted to tell me that after she had left me on the previous afternoon she had remembered something she wanted to tell me and that she would come back to the Club for lunch that noon. By the next morning I had permanently changed my breakfast hour from the last to the first shift. Thus began a habit that flourished over the next few summers -- that is, of meeting for meals when she was free. In 1965 we moved our Thursday lunches to the patio of the Golden Bear so that Mrs. McLaughlin could listen to the student speakers in Sproul Plaza. She usually disagreed but she felt that she should hear them.

At first glance Mrs. McLaughlin seemed tall; actually, she was slightly shorter than I (five feet six inches). When I first met her she was, in her early 80s, slightly stooped and when she walked with her hands clasped behind her she had rather a contemplative appearance. I have already mentioned her steady walk -- steady in more ways than one so that she walked from one end of the campus almost to the other if the classes she audited were so placed. She had clear blue eyes that could turn hard blue if she happened to talk about something that displeased her, and I remember thinking how on the days when she was feeling well, the pinkness of her skin was unusual for anyone of her years -- that and her carefully dressed white hair and her rose-colored fingernails. Particularly in those first years of our friendship she seemed to emanate something like indestructable energy -- a misleading impression as I found out; for although she only occasionally spoke of her health she was not entirely well and in the next years she visibly grew frailer. But even when she was feeling her most miserable, an adamant quality asserted itself, conveying the impression that if she could help it, she would not give in. On two of these occasions I remember going down to Oakland to wait with her until the San Francisco bus came. My own feeling was that she shouldn't be alone on the bus, even from Oakland to the city; but she would have none of this and refused to let me go any farther as she climbed on that city-bound bus.

Perhaps in part this impression of extraordinary energy that I have just mentioned resulted from her direct and emphatic manner of speaking, particularly about something or someone who aroused her indignation. Her outspoken indignation was one of her many beguiling qualities, although I shouldn't have thought so had I been the target of that articulate displeasure: "And I said to him, 'You can't do that!' That not honest!'"

For me Mrs. McLaughlin stood distinguished by the forcefulness of her convictions, by her honesty, by her kindness, and by her unvarnished detestation of double-talk and disingenuousness. It is only fair to observe that her forcefulness was not at all times universally admired.

The obituary in the San Francisco Chronicle mentioned her serene beauty. Serene she could be; benevolent she could be, and wonderfully kind and ordered and succinct; but to mention these qualities alone and to forget her wonderful ability for indignation is to oversimplify her, and thereby lose much of her complex magnetism and effectiveness. Not infrequently she used that explosive quality to create an unexpectedly comic effect, for she told a story unusually well -- at best with a sense of dramatic incident and a keen sense of timing. Her friends will remember her account of her last meeting with Garret McEnerney; or of the numerous tribulations when she presided over the luncheon for Queen Elizabeth of the Belgians. Years later when she told me about it she concluded: "I came home, went into the kitchen, sat down, took off my shoes and said, 'I hate women.'"

Another quality that I admired was her ability to make decisions and to stick by them. This point of view she tersely summed up in a letter she sent me in 1965, when I was nominated as a Fulbright Visiting Lecturer to Japan but did not know if I could go. Mrs. McLaughlin wrote: "Now you must make a plan so that you can leave your problems.

"I will say to you just what I said to a friend in a similarly difficult choice -- 'Be convinced that your decision is right and be prepared to face any consequences.'" From her descriptions of some of her experiences when she was active in San Francisco civic life, I am certain that when she felt she had to, she followed her own precept.

By the time we met she was no longer driving that green Cadillac for which she was evidently famous and feared. In fact, a number of persons have indicated to me that it was a great day for the general traffic safety of San Francisco, and for the equanimity of her friends when she relinquished the wheel of that fearsome automobile and relied on the Yellow Cab Company. From all reports she was a terrible driver. According to one reliable passenger she often ignored red lights and the restrictions of traffic laws, seeming not to care whether she was on the right or the left-hand side of the road or when U-turns might be made. A friend who survived one of these excursions still gasps and rolls her eyes when she describes a ride from 2200 College Avenue to Oakland, with Mrs. McLaughlin forcing the car forward regardless of red traffic signals, impeding automobiles, and hastily scattering pedestrians; this same passenger is not at all amused when I remark, "But Mrs. McLaughlin was merely following her own injunction: 'Be convinced that your decision is right and be prepared to face any consequences.'"

No description would be complete without a mention of her enjoyment of people. I am not certain of all the components that comprised that quality, but I do know that to her friends she conveyed a quick responsiveness that made her friends, old and new, feel that they were individually and genuinely important to her. Frances Cahn, who went to Miss Burke's School with Jean McLaughlin and who lived a few doors from 3575 Clay Street, remembers how when she was growing up, Mrs. McLaughlin would talk to her about her youthful problems, always giving those conversations the serious attention she gave to her own contemporaries.

One way she made her friends, old and new, feel that they were each important to her was illustrated in her Christmas cards. I have no idea of how many she sent out, but my guess is that they numbered several hundred and many of them contained personal messages. Sometimes she wrote that at Christmas she liked to review the year, "counting my blessings"; then she explained why she was sending that particular card. Obviously, each of these messages was specially composed and I am certain that the young and the old who received these greetings and saw themselves catalogued as "blessings" must have felt distinguished and proud.

When Mrs. McLaughlin stayed at the Women's Faculty Club in the summers she almost always wore a blue and white silk print dress or a dark silk of some kind; a white sweater; and, when she went out, a navy blue coat. This near-uniform was topped by a close-fitting, rimless black straw hat trimmed with blue velvet bows, the blue harmonizing with her eyes. One morning I unexpectedly met her as she was coming downstairs -- this time not carrying her notebook and not wearing her habitual classroom garb, wearing a toque composed of small, soft-reddish velvet and silk rosebuds and a fashionable looking silk print dress that matched the silk and velvet hat. "Oh," I blurted, "don't you look beautiful!" "No, I don't," she replied, "but I'm going to a luncheon in the city and I can't wear my college clothes to that." I still smile when I think of Mrs. McLaughlin and her durable college clothes, contrasted with Mrs. McLaughlin in the soft reds and light blues I afterwards saw when she was home in San Francisco.

Every summer -- I think it was in early August -- she left world affairs and returned to Clay Street for several days so that she could put up raspberry jam. This was an annual rite and Mrs. McLaughlin was openly and unabashedly proud of it, sometimes bringing a sample of the handiwork back to Berkeley, where it quickly disappeared.

One of her greatest prides was the honorary doctorate she received from the University of California. She adored the University. She adored its achievements and its greatness. When she talked about it she conveyed her sense that she was talking about a living, breathing thing of grandeur; that during her lifetime she had seen it grow from a small college into something almost universal -- a place whose magnitude transcended the limits of the state of California and reached out to enlighten and improve the world. I used to think that for her the University represented not only old friends and her inner life and growth, but that it also stood for the unpredictably numerous ways in which mankind could be improved. Several times when she told me about a University occasion -- Charter Day, for example, when she marched in the procession -- she added, "I didn't really feel like making the trip over here, but I put on my regiments and marched and was glad I did."

H.B.: "But if you didn't feel like it, why did you go?"

Mrs. McLaughlin: (Opening her eyes wide) "Why? Why, it was my responsibility. They gave me this degree, you know."

In the early time of our acquaintance our conversations were largely limited to the Progressive period and the development of the Progressive Party in California. This was because I was writing about the turbulent and somewhat abrasive Francis J. Heney, particularly about his political fortunes and misfortunes after 1910. Although as she told me she had been neither a Progressive nor politically active at this time, she had known many of the San Francisco group close to Hiram Johnson, particularly in the years of his governorship; and she recalled events with gusto, for she could tell a story vividly and with a marked sense of dramatic insight. What struck me forcefully that first afternoon was her clear distinction between hearsay and what she herself knew at firsthand. When she was uncertain of a point, she told me; and she had an impressively clear sense of exactly what her part was in an undertaking, as against the parts played by her associates -- an ability sometimes lacking when one recollects the long-ago past.

As our friendship grew she realized that she could trust me not to repeat details she told me in confidence; after that she often gave me what might be called "background briefings." These were really the highlights of her recollections, the social backgrounds, the educations, the families (particularly the wives), the personal eccentricities, the limitations, and often the hopes and frustrations of some of the men we discussed. Often I would bring back from the Bancroft Library a list of names of minor, hardworking men I could only briefly and unsatisfactorily identify. And although she would insist that she really knew very little about the Progressives of the time, she would start to talk and out would come an anecdote or a connecting link that turned these men from names on a list into living persons.

It was, however, Chester Rowell who cemented our friendship. Several of us were reading in the Rowell Papers and Mrs. McLaughlin, who had immense regard for him, was delighted that his massive collection was at the Bancroft Library and available for research. I cannot estimate the number of hours she and I talked about him, his work, and his contributions to the life of his time. Of all the California Progressives, Rowell was the man for whom she felt the greatest sympathy and admiration. Her esteem was not primarily because of his career as a Progressive (an aspect of his life with which she was not particularly familiar) but because of their common interest in two vital subjects -- the University of California and the Institute of Pacific Relations.

Mrs. McLaughlin often spoke of what she termed Rowell's "quality of mind." "Of all the leading California Progressives," she said to me, "I think that Mr. Rowell was the most truly intellectual -- the one true intellectual." She admired his breadth of knowledge, his "international mindedness," and his devotion to the University. I cannot count the times she said, "Even during his lifetime few people had any idea of the extent to which Mr. Rowell watched over, worked for, and fought for the University. Its tradition of intellectual greatness owes a great deal to his concept of what he as a Regent should do. No one has any idea of the selfless way in which Mr. Rowell carried out his duties as Regent. His chief aim was to insure the greatness of the University." Also, since she had known him best when they were both members of the Institute of Pacific Relations, she liked to recall those years and his particular contributions.

In addition she told me about her youthful life in California and Nevada; about going to Miss West's School; about her father's meat-packing business; about how she and her sister crossed the Sierra on horseback; she spoke eloquently of Tahoe, then blue, uncrowded, and unspoiled, and this often led her to speak with deep feeling and sensitivity of some of the beautiful, out-of-the-way spots in the mountains -- spots that no longer exist; and these reminiscences of course led her to the imperative need for conservation. In logical sequence she talked about the development of her interest in community service in San Francisco, about the growth of the state, and about the unexpected problems that this growth had created. "Our beautiful state wasn't intended to be home for millions of people. The land here simply can't support them."

She had a vivid sense of the continuity of California history. As she frequently reminded me, she had seen profound and basic changes; she had seen the state change from an agricultural to a largely industrial society, and the contrast between the past and present ways of life was a subject she often discussed. For me and I am sure for many others, she personified the continuity of California history.

Since we were both staying at the Women's Faculty Club, it was only natural that she should talk at length about her old and much loved friend, Lucy Ward Stebbins.* The Women's Faculty Club was in large part created and sustained by Dean Stebbins, and Mrs. McLaughlin zealously wanted to see the continuation (survival is a better word) of her friend's dream. However, she feared it was a lost cause; increasingly she pondered the place and function of a club for women faculty in a university that seemed less and less to believe in the need for women faculty. At the same time she was proud of the club's uniqueness. She enthusiastically asserted its value, and she often remarked that she hoped and prayed that her forebodings would prove wrong and that Miss Stebbin's vision would be revitalized. She was proud of her membership, but she felt that it was a beleaguered institution that somehow had managed to survive in spite of great obstacles. And if this were the case, then a realistic estimate of the future was essential. "I do believe in women," she said to me, "but regardless of this belief, in no case should sentimentality take the place of a clear-sighted evaluation of the entire question."

In 1964 Dr. Anne Low-Beer was staying at the Club, and the consequence was that our conversational horizons were markedly widened. Mrs. Low-Beer had for years been active in San Francisco affairs, including a term as president of the League of Women Voters (1932-34). Although much younger than Mrs. McLaughlin, the two had known a number of the same people and in some cases they were in emphatic and articulate disagreement. I have often sat open-mouthed while they argued their differences, neither one convincing the other but always leaving me with the feelings, "How kind of them to do this for me! It's the best possible seminar!" Also, Dr. Chiyoko Tokunaga, the geneticist, was then in residence and Mrs. McLaughlin got much pleasure in reminiscing with her about Japan as she had seen it before World War II.

During that same summer, Mrs. McLaughlin characteristically set about to enlarge as best she could my acquaintance among the rapidly dwindling group of men and women who had been active in San Francisco city affairs before 1914. This could not have been an easy task for her, I am sure. Typically, she never once gave me a hint of the time she spent on this enterprise, but I am certain that considerable maneuvering was at times required.

For example, she very much wanted me to meet one of Hiram Johnson's ancient and honorable advisers, a San Franciscan who had been a close adviser of the governor. In addition to being ancient and honorable, this gentleman was a busy and unapproachable lawyer. I am under the impression that he not only informed Mrs. McLaughlin that he did not wish to cooperate with her generous impulse, but that he volunteered that he had no patience with such damned foolishness. Characteristically, Mrs. McLaughlin was unimpressed by his attitude. "He has the reputation of being the rudest man in San Francisco," she said to me, "but I think I can persuade him." She did, too.

On another occasion I mentioned a reformer I wanted to meet. She had excellent reasons for thinking that he was too mentally shaky for reliable discussion, but, having decided to give him a trial run without me, she invited him to dinner at 3575 Clay Street. At eight o'clock the next morning I was called to the telephone: "My dear, I'm so sorry that he won't be any help to you; he'll be no help at all. He arrived late for dinner and most of the evening thought I was Hiram Johnson's secretary and that Hiram Johnson wanted him to write a book!"

In 1965 and 1966 she methodically undertook to discover what manner of summer visitor stayed at the Women's Faculty Club. She said to me, "I've known the old-timers at the Club for years, but the summer school group are a mystery to me, so I'll count on you to introduce me. I want to find out about their interests and how they feel about this Club." We were a miscellaneous lot, we summer birds of passage: one or two of us had come out to read at the Bancroft; two or three were teaching; three or four were feverishly writing theses; perhaps a dozen had come to Berkeley for refresher courses; several were emeriti; and one had evidently come to Berkeley in order to practice the piano. No matter what we were doing, we were either rooted in the past or unable to see very far beyond our own special projects -- that is, all of us except Mrs. McLaughlin who, in her mid-eighties, encompassed us all and talked to us all about our work, about the past, the present, and sometimes even the future. I was often reminded of a remark Dean Stebbins made to a friend of mine: "Some people are tasters for knowledge, and some people are thirsters for knowledge. Emma is a thirster."

As I saw her in action, she was most interested and best informed in foreign affairs, particularly in Asia (she especially admired Professor Robert A. Scalapino and took his courses whenever she could); politics, national, state and local; history, especially California history; the condition of the public schools and public libraries; and public welfare. In 1964 Mrs. McLaughlin went on her first trip to Europe and after that I thought I detected a new dimension and a new interest, art. One day while she was enlarging her acquaintance among the summer visitors, I determined that as of the next morning, for twenty-four hours I would keep a brief memorandum, unbeknownst to her, of the various subjects Mrs. McLaughlin encountered and discussed at breakfast, lunch, and dinner.

By the time I clattered down to breakfast on that designated day she was already there, reading the Chronicle and -- reinforced by the six a.m. radio -- commenting on the news as she turned the pages. A faculty member, a native Californian at least sixteen years her junior, questioned her recollection of some detail about the shipping of walnuts, whereupon Mrs. McLaughlin produced such a series of facts and citations from both her own experience and that of persons of her immediate acquaintance that the incipient argument was immediately disposed of, thoroughly quashed. She and I then talked a little about California politics and she reminisced about Senator Phelan and Montalvo.

At lunch she and I talked about developments in the civil rights movement; this led into the subject of integration, which led us into a discussion about the Chinese in San Francisco. This led us briefly into Mainland China. At this point someone in educational testing sat down, and I soon was listening to an animated discussion about that. The tester departed, and Mrs. McLaughlin compared the campus planting in her undergraduate days with the landscaping of 1964 (she obviously had been thinking of this as she had walked to her classes that morning), and that led to a description of the problems Thomas Church had encountered and solved when he landscaped "my sister's small garden" at 3575 Clay Street.

At dinner she carried on a lengthy discussion with two nuns from New Jersey on the techniques of teaching science in parochial schools. Also, Dr. Catherine Callaghan (now at Ohio State) had just come in from the field, where she was collecting material for her Bodega-Miwok dictionary. Mrs. McLaughlin was always interested in her progress and in the cooperativeness of her informants, so they talked about Indians. In addition, Dr. Callaghan's favorite diversion was a matter of fascination, for she studied judo, and Mrs. McLaughlin was as much mystified by these techniques as she was interested in methods of collecting Indian words; her puzzlement about the former arose from the circumstance that occasionally Dr. Callaghan vigorously practised sweeps and falls in a not-too-soundproof bedroom directly over Mrs. McLaughlin's bemused head.

Dr. Callaghan having left, Mrs. McLaughlin and I talked briefly about Anita Whitney and -- I can't remember in what order -- the late President Kennedy, Constance Baker Motley, Martin Luther King, and Malcolm X.*

*Although she did not make these remarks on that particular day, I quote them because they are characteristic and I have heard them a number of times:

"A pooling of ignorance is not an educational experience."
(This epigram was made by an old friend.)

"I have always had to reason from what I know."

"Anyone my age has learned to live on different levels of emotions and spirit; so we go through life."

I regret that I made notes like this for only one day. Other subjects on other days would have included the Southern Pacific in California politics, the growth of Los Angeles, James Rolph, Friend W. Richardson, FDR, Aurelia Henry Rinehart, the Institute of Public Relations, the Public Dance Hall Committee, the San Francisco Foundation, the war in Viet Nam -- and these are only a very few of the subjects we discussed.

In keeping with these broad interests, Mrs. McLaughlin belonged to a luncheon group they called the "Yack Yacks." The function is self-explanatory. The members included Mrs. Adolph Deutsch, Mrs. Robert Sproul, Mrs. Mary Hutchinson, Mrs. R. H. Braden, but I can't remember the full list. They met -- once a month, I think -- for lunch, usually seriatim at a member's house. I have been told that Mrs. McLaughlin's luncheons were the culinary points.

Also, I wish I could work in something about the unforgettables, the amazing Georgianna Carden -- "George," as Mrs. McLaughlin called her -- and Emily Huntington.

From September 1966 until July 1968 I was in Japan. From September 1966 until April 22, 1968 (that is the date of the last letter she sent me), one of my most regular correspondents was Mrs. McLaughlin. Knowing that I wanted to keep up with American developments, she sent me newspaper clippings, magazine articles, and letters about recent events in California. How I relied on her assessments of political developments, of the state's political leaders, of the student protests at Berkeley, and her attitude toward the rising black protests! As soon as I saw the long, thickly filled envelopes, I knew that shortly I would be reading numerous clippings that she had torn from the San Francisco morning newspaper, and that in all probability she had written across one, "Be sure to read all of these." So informative were Mrs. McLaughlin's bundles of clippings and her analyses of what was going on three thousand miles from Tokyo that visiting professors, wondering what was happening at home, often asked me, "Have you mail from San Francisco? What does your friend say about Berkeley?"

Her analyses of events at Berkeley were particularly interesting to us, and I regret that some of her letters were "borrowed" and never returned. And her opinions got around, as when someone just arrived from Taiwan quoted Mrs. McLaughlin to me with impressive authenticity. (He was quoting the substance of a letter she had written to me.)

Although from the earliest weeks of our acquaintance Mrs. McLaughlin and I had talked a great deal about the changing emphasis of the black movement in the United States, I felt that she was understandably not close to it in the way that she was to the student protest movement. She, of course, recognized the profound social seriousness of the situation and the need for a change in the black man's condition, but probably many blacks would have said that she oversimplified.

As she saw it, one of the fundamental causes for the trouble was that "the avenues of communication of the affluent society are filled with urging everyone to have everything of luxury now and pay later. The younger Negro[es] [replied?] by rioting since they do not have opportunity for credit cards." Another time she stated her belief that most blacks wanted "peace and quiet [and] a chance for education and jobs." She regarded the black militants as hotheads, and she saw them as a grave social problem and was concerned.

The student protests on the other hand, struck an immediately personal note. I have already remarked that when she was on campus in 1965 and 1966, we regularly went to the Golden Bear for Thursday lunch so that she could hear the student speakers. Sometimes she was horrified, but she sat through to the end. She considered them "these people who are determined to challenge the 'establishment'" and saw them as threats to the order and discipline of the trained intellect, destructive to the existence of the University she had lived with, grown with, officiated at, known intimately, and loved.

On April 22, 1968, she sent me a note describing both the aftermath of Dr. King's assassination and the changes in the political situation in the United States. Almost casually she added, "I have a slight illness, but though slight it has incapacitated me, since it affected my entire anatomy."

Previously she had written that we both must be sure to plan our respective summers so that we could have time in which to talk over the past two years; this remark I clung to and I made my plans accordingly. But it was not to be. As the ship on which I was homeward bound came into San Pedro Harbor, a tugboat brought out telegrams and special delivery letters for the passengers, and in one of them I learned that Mrs. McLaughlin had died.

Faculty Clubs are organized on six campuses to provide social, cultural, and recreational programs for their members. The newest clubhouses will be those now under construction on the Davis and Santa Barbara campuses.

At Berkeley, the Faculty Club traces its beginnings to a Dining Association for students and faculty members formed in 1894. The association occupied a cottage originally built in 1873 to house women students. A small room was set aside for members of the faculty.

As students developed a preference for other eating arrangements, faculty patronage expanded. By 1901, several faculty members became seriously interested in forming an organization exclusively for the faculty. Professors Irving Stringham, William D. Armes, Lincoln Hutchinson, Andrew Lawson, Winthrop John Van Leuven Osterhout, William A. Setchell, and Henry D. Waite were constituted as a committee to draft suggestions. The committee reported in December, 1901, urging that a faculty clubhouse be built adjoining the old Dining Association building. Twenty-two faculty members signed up for membership and a formal membership meeting was held on March 10, 1902. Stringham was elected as the first president and the club was named: "Faculty Club of the University of California." It has never been the "men's" faculty club officially, but the intent has been understood from the beginning and women are not admitted to the members' dining room, lounge, and recreation areas except on special occasions (this despite the fact that Phoebe Apperson Hearst, who took an early interest in the club and made it an object of her philanthropy, was made an honorary life member in 1902). The fireplace in the new clubhouse was first lighted at special ceremonies on September 16, 1902.

The club's quarters were enlarged in 1903 when bachelor members were permitted to add a two-story addition that would provide sleeping rooms upstairs and club rooms on the first floor. They were to be compensated with rent-free accommodations for ten years. This addition was made to the west of the original club. A southern addition was made in 1904 by Henry Morse Stephens and Mr. Jerome Landfield under terms similar to those arranged by other members the year before. In 1906, the rights of these residents were bought out by the club using funds acquired through a bank loan and the issuance of a $13,000 bond issue. The property and debts of the old Dining Association were obtained at the same time and improvements were made in the kitchen and dining facilities. A second bond issue for $20,000 in 1914, together with a $1,000 contribution by the Regents and money obtained through personal loans granted to members of the club's board of directors, made possible expansion of the dining rooms to the north, more bedrooms, a new office, a new kitchen, and living quarters for personnel. Still further expansion was made possible by the issuance of a $5,000 bond issue in 1925.

In 1958, the Regents made both a contribution and a loan to finance further improvement and expansion. This resulted in the building of more dining accommodations and meeting rooms, and a change in location for the office, lounge, and recreation facilities. The club now has a modern kitchen, three large dining rooms, 13 smaller rooms for luncheon or dinner meetings, 22 rooms for transient guests, two lounges, a card room, and a billiard room.

Through the years, the club has served not only as a center of informal faculty conversation and activities, but also has been the setting for evenings of music and other cultural programs. The most memorable events are the annual Christmas dinners that feature a hearty dinner, good wine, singing led by a "monks choir" and special entertainment written and performed by members.

In 1966, the club had 1,600 members.

The Women's Faculty Club at Berkeley was organized in 1919 at a gathering of faculty women and administrators in the office of Miss Lucy W. Stebbins, dean of women. An initial membership of 66 was increased to 100 by the nomination of associate members from among women donors to the University and professional women of the community.

Early meetings were held in the Forestry Cottage and an office in Hearst Hall, with an annual "banquet" at the Town and Gown Club on Dwight Way. After the cottage was removed and Hearst Hall burned in 1922, a reserve fund of $10,000 was obtained by the sale of stock in the club to members, and by gift. The Regents were then asked for permission to build a clubhouse on the campus. A site was granted on Strawberry Creek east of Senior Men's Hall, a bond issue to finance the building was rapidly bought up, and the University architect John Galen Howard prepared plans. The three-story, brown shingled building was completed and opened in October, 1923. The lower floor, intended for general use, contains a lounge, library, two dining rooms, and a kitchen. The two upper floors provide private rooms for 25 residents.

The club now has nearly 500 members in the categories of active, associate, and retired, formerly active. Its affairs are conducted by a board of seven directors, elected for two-year terms, so arranged that three directorships become vacant each year. A separate Building Committee of five members, elected in the same manner as the directors, finances and cares for such repairs or remodeling as become necessary. Both groups elect their own officers.

FACULTY WIVES ORGANIZATIONS

On most of the University campuses, faculty wives have formed organizations, often together with women staff and faculty members, for the purposes of fellowship and service to the University community. Their activities include social gatherings, meetings of special interest groups, and student services, such as foreign student aid, hospital visits, loan funds, and scholarships.

Berkeley: For almost 60 years, faculty wives on the Berkeley campus have attended the College Teas for the purpose of becoming better acquainted. The teas, which originated in 1907 under the sponsorship of Mrs. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, have undergone some changes through the years, but their purpose remains the same.

The first year, the College Teas met at the Men's Faculty Club. The 89 guests attending the first tea arrived on foot, by carriage, or by streetcar. The food was prepared by the members themselves.

For the next 15 years, the first Hearst Gymnasium for Women was the meeting place for the organization. When this building was destroyed by fire in 1922, the College Teas treasury was indemnified for its loss of samovars, blue china, and embroidered napkins. This insurance money was turned over to the Regents of the University for a student loan fund which is still in existence and which has been augmented over the years.

In the early years, fathers, brothers, sons, and husbands of subscribers were invited to the April tea. This practice was abandoned in favor of an evening reception to which husbands were invited. The teas are now for women only.

In 1922-23, the teas were held at the Town and Gown Club. They then moved to their present location, the Women's Faculty Club. The members now include women faculty as well as wives of faculty, administrative, and research personnel. The chancellor's wife is president, the University President's wife, honorary president.

The University of California Section Club is nearly 40 years old. During its history, this organization of faculty women and wives has promoted friendship and provided the fellowship of shared interests and hobbies for hundreds of women associated with the Berkeley campus. Organized in 1927 at a meeting in the home of the wife of the University President, Mrs. W. W. Campbell, the Section Club has grown from the original 25 members to over 850 participating in 22 sections. Besides these interest groups, the club sponsors three activities whose sole aim is the welfare of students: foreign student hospitality, ways and means, and S.O.S. (student aid).

The Foreign Student Committee includes over 30 women who work to help students from other countries feel at home in the community. Included in this effort is help with housing, home hospitality, the lending of household equipment, and various parties and social gatherings including faculty and students.

Over the years, the Ways and Means Committee of S.O.S. has sponsored various fund raising activities. Money from these has been used for the student-oriented activities of the Section Club.

The Dames Club, an organization of student wives, is sponsored by the Section Club, with faculty wives acting as advisors. An emergency loan fund is maintained for the use of wives. This provides non-interest bearing short-term loans for needy student families. Money for play equipment at the nursery school at Albany Village student housing project was donated by the Section Club.

Members of the Cowell Hospital Committee of S.O.S. call on students in the hospital and during registration, serve coffee and punch to students as they come through the hospital. In the fall of 1965, more than 7,500 students were served.

to have a new furnace, we've got to have new electrical circuits, and we've got to have new radiators. We can't pay for it, we've got to give it up."

Two dear ladies who lived at the Club, and were employed on the Berkeley campus, often had dinner with me on Friday night. They talked about their fear for the Club, that people were giving up. We formed the idea of a picture book of the Club. Many of the beautiful articles of furniture were given when it was first built in '23 by a group of women who had been forbidden membership in the men's club.

Then, I thought perhaps some of the people who estimated what was needed by the Club had exaggerated. So I first asked a plumber to come and look. He said that the outside drains had been stopped up, and that was why water backed up into the cellar. So, the people in charge of the basement were instructed, the drains were opened, and all was well.

I asked another expert to look at the clubhouse. This person said, "Oh, this building is marvellously supported! Just look at these piers. The building isn't supported just by its wall foundations as many buildings are. These great piers of stoutest wood probably are very deep."

The college architect came to one of the Women's Club meetings. Now, he didn't build anything. All he did was to look at designs. So, he came and spoke about the Club. He said that he had loved the Women's Faculty Club for many years, loved it from his very heart. "But," he said, "we've got to admit it's a tired old building."

I could have screamed with joy. He'd said exactly the wrong thing — or the right thing, from my point of view. After the meeting, I went up to him and said, "There is one point you made I must disagree with. You said this is a tired old building. Forty years old. Do you remember that the architect was John Galen Howard and that he grew up in New England, where there are houses of timber construction that are still standing, in perfect condition, over 200 years old?"

Pictures were taken of the beautiful furnishings, and made into a portfolio. We had a list of people who had lived in the Club in the past, and I offered to send a letter to them asking if they could write their happy impressions. One of the women said, "It won't do any good. You won't get any answers."

I tried anyway. I was certain that we sent 36 letters, each one hand written. But we got 40 replies! Even from remote places, we got airplane answers. The letters were touching, full of remembered enjoyment. We made a booklet of those, and a portfolio of those pictures, with the names of donors to the Club listed.

Margery Thompson asked Miss Minard to tell of her role in saving the Women's Faculty Club building at the U. of C., Berkeley.

Over and over, when something wonderful has happened, I realize how important one individual can be if she will play her part. My part was a very small cog, very small.

I was at luncheon one day with some of the older women at the Club who had been wanting to save it, and had worked very hard to raise money — oh, very hard. They had done everything they could think of to raise money. They said, "We can't do one more thing. We're just exhausted." I felt sorry for them and I said, "I haven't done anything. Why can't I do something?" One of them said, "Go to it. You have our blessing."

"The expense is going to be enormous," they said. "We've got

Dear Miss Minnard:

On December 11, 1970, in response to your "request for service" to this department, a complete inspection was made of the above-referenced building relative to the structural conditions and to the conformity with the Uniform Building Code, as well as with the Housing Code, City of Berkeley. The following was noted:

The structure appears to be approximately 45 years old. There are two floors used for private sleeping rooms; one floor used for living rooms, dining rooms, and kitchen area with full cooking facilities. There is also a full basement.

The building is Type VN construction with no fire rating. The exterior wall covering is wood shingles over wood wall sheathing. The wall area on the basement, where exposed, is stucco over wood sheathing. (The balance of these walls are concrete retaining walls in good condition.) The interior walls of the living area are of lath and plaster, which appear to be in good condition. The walls and ceiling of the basement are unprotected joists, studs, columns and beams.

Access was gained to approximately 80 per cent of the private room area (sleeping rooms), 100 per cent of the main floor, 100 per cent of the basement area and the attic area.

In checking the basement area, it is our feeling that because of its arrangement, it need not be considered as another story. This would, in effect, make it a three-story building.

Inspection of the interior revealed the following:

1. Walls and ceilings are of lath and plaster in good condition (no fire protection).
2. Four means of egress was available from all floors. These consisted of two fire escapes in good operating condition and two sets of stairs. Fire doors (1 3/8" thick, metal clad) was installed on each floor to the stairways. These were double acting doors with wire glass panels. During the course of inspection, some of these doors were found to be propped open by the use of rubber wedges.

Miss Florence Minnard

-2-

December 14, 1970

3. All private rooms (sleeping) were checked for size, light, ventilation, electrical requirements, and sanitary facilities, including plumbing. A thorough check was made to determine any possible structural defects or signs of structural failure.

The basement was checked for the following: the structural conditions; also, the condition of the plumbing, heating and electrical systems.

The exterior was checked for structural conditions.

The following are our findings along with our recommendations:

- a. The Uniform Building Code does not permit a non-fire rated building, three stories in height, to be used as an "H" occupancy (living purposes, apartment, hotel, etc.). The Code requires such a building to be not less than one-hour fire restrictive throughout. This may be accomplished by the installation of 1/2" gypsum board over all interior walls (existing plaster will be accepted as part of the fire assembly), plus 7/8" stucco on the exterior. A minimum of 5/8" gypsum board (approved fire-rated) would be required on the walls and ceiling of the basement area.

*alternately
accepted by the Club.*

In lieu of the above, a complete approved sprinkler system would be acceptable. This would include all floors, the basement and the attic.

- b. Found all rooms (private) to conform to the Housing Code, City of Berkeley in the following manner:
 - (1) size, (2) light and ventilation, (3) sanitary facilities and plumbing, (4) electrical and (5) heating.
- c. A check of the walls and ceilings revealed no indication of any structural failure. There were some hair line cracks noted. These were neither large nor numerous enough to suggest structural distress.
- d. On the main floor we found adequate light and ventilation. It was noted that the exit from the living room area was controlled by sliding doors. These are not acceptable as a means of egress. It is suggested these be replaced with approved swinging doors.

Miss Florence Minnard

-3-

December 14, 1970

In the dining room it was noted the second means of egress was blocked with table and chairs. It is recommended these be removed and that direct access to this exit be available at all times.

- e. Some electrical extension cords were noted in Rooms No. 208 and No. 312. These should be kept to a minimum or if possible, removed entirely. Also found the cover plate missing from an electrical wall outlet in Room No. 203. This should be replaced at once.
- f. Double acting doors in the stair enclosure does not provide the fire protection intended. These doors should be made to operate in one direction (and/or in the direction of egress). Also, each door should be provided with an approved self-closing device and an approved latching device. These doors should be kept in a "closed" position at all times.
- g. In checking the exterior, it was found that a shingle here and there (very few) were missing. These should be replaced as soon as possible. The exterior does not at this time show any signs of deterioration. The exterior surface, however, is in need of a protective covering. This should be taken care of in the not too distant future.
- h. In checking the basement, it was noted that the plumbing, heating and the electrical systems were in good condition. Some new electrical work has been installed recently, which appears to conform to the Electrical Code. There appeared to be no signs of structural damage or failure.

already solved in item "a"

Our conclusion is the building, except for the items mentioned, is in sound structural condition.

Respectfully submitted,

To every Voting Member of The Women's Faculty Club

Re: "Ballot"

In the "proposition" issued recently by the Board of Directors in regard to the discontinuance of the W F C as such, there appear several statements of rather serious mis-information and mis-statement.

Section 1, lines 1-3, state: "The W F C, according to studies made by the Campus Architect, requires repairs and renovation in the amount of approximately $340,000 to bring it to acceptable standard of continuing operation."

These items as listed in the Architects and Engineers File No. 41-X242, originated, NOT by a study made by the campus architect, but by a survey of the building by the then-chairman of the Building Committee of the W F C together with a member of the architect's staff. This was made at the time (1967) when it was planned to raise $80,000, the Regents to lend us $80,000 and a gift from the Regents of $80,000. Many of these items are desirable, but, aside from the fire protection, none are in any way necessary to the operation of the clubhouse.

These items were never formally presented to the Board of Directors of the W F C, nor were they ever formally approved by them.

Among other items, the list includes:

- Remodeling or adding closet space in each room
- Various partitions, dividing of larger rooms, etc.
- Remodeling bath rooms, including ceramic tile around tubs
- Remodeling kitchenettes
- Remodel old office for refreshment lounge
- Replace all steam radiators with new wall-fin convectors
- Replace all bath room fixtures with new
- Add new bath rooms, laboratories and toilet rooms
- Provide new lighting fixtures throughout
- Provide telephone and TV outlet for each room
- Provide master TV antenna on roof

As far as can be ascertained, this list was not revised when the loan was no longer possible. As of August 7, 1967, the architect's office estimated the cost at $240,000; the present cost, as of March 1, 1971, at $344,500.

Does the failure to provide these luxury items then offer the only alternative of moving into one room in the men's club ?

The last sentence of Section I states that "the income of the W F C has never been sufficient to permit the accumulation of a reserve for maintenance and repair"

This shows an utter lack of research into the history of the building! In 1950, the Building Committee had savings of more than $10,000 in the bank. A portion of this was used to re-cover the roof with fire-resistant shingles; to replace window sills along the south face of the building; to remove vines which were damaging the outside walls; to replace damaged shingles and to re-stain and paint the trim over the entire building.

Later in the same decade, funds had again accumulated and the kitchen was entirely remodeled; fire doors were placed at the heads of stairways leading to the residence floors and new furniture was placed in some of the rooms. In 1967, the cost of renovating the dining room was met by some $11,000, again from funds of the W F C Building Committee.

At the present time, although we are rapidly recovering, it has not been possible to accumulate a reserve for Maintenance, due to losses caused by unfortunate management in the last two years.

It has been stated with much repetition that we have a "tired old building". Since no review was made of the so-called "necessary" items, nor was any outside contractor consulted to give an impartial opinion on the condition of the building, we secured, and paid for, the services of the Building Inspector of the City of Berkeley. In his report, (attached) he states that he considers the building to be "in good structural condition".

In speaking of the two clubs, the Board of Directors has used three different terms:

First paragraph, second line

... The two Faculty Clubs combined

Item 6, last line

... The amalgamation of the two clubs

Item 3, first line

...The Joint Committee on Merger of the Faculty Clubs

While these three terms may be synonymous in literature, they do not have the same meaning when applied to a corporation. Which are we voting for ?

Also, can the Board of Directors of a corporation ask for a vote "in principle" ? This, in reality, constitutes asking for a "yes" vote from two points of view. And in what manner can any Board of Directors of any corporation "release" a building or any of the corporation's capital assets without a definite statement of the form of release, such as sale, rental or gift ?

We disagree with the last three lines of Section 3 that "establishment of a lounge area will preserve the atmosphere of the W F C, etc..." The Club was founded to be of help in problems of education, not only of the women on the campus, but of visiting faculty, and of foreign and graduate students. To remove the possibility of furnishing living quarters by substituting "transient living accomodations" and a mere social lounge seems to destroy the very purpose which the Club has carried on for nearly half a century.

THE WOMEN'S FACULTY CLUB, INC.

February 23, 1971

Dear Members:

Because so many of you have raised questions which have not had satisfactory answers, we have prepared a summary of the activities of the various committees which, since 1966, have been involved in reviewing the problems of the Men's and Women's Faculty Clubs to determine whether or not there could be a joint solution.

I am sorry those of you who wrote us after the December, 1970 meeting were not answered personally; this is one of the problems of a volunteer board. I apologize. If this summary does not answer all of your questions, please do not hesitate to ask for additional information, or perhaps it might be more satisfactory for you to read the minutes of the various committees from which this summary was compiled. They are on file in the club office.

In 1966, a committee composed of members of the Board of Directors of the WFC went to the Chancellor to ask whether or not it were possible for the University to provide a subsidy for the dining room of the WFC. As you all know, this has over the years, presented us with a financial problem and the deficit has been supported by the dues of the members. This request led to the appointment by the Chancellor of a special committee, which came to be known as the Ad Hoc Committee, to study the Men's Faculty Club and the Women's Faculty Club. This committee continued to function with occasional changes in membership, until June, 1970, when it was disbanded. Upon recommendation of the Ad Hoc committee a special committee was appointed in April. This committee was composed of three members each from the B boards of Directors of both clubs to make proposals to the memberships for a possible combination of the two clubs in one facility.

Also in 1967 it was agreed that the Building Committee of the WFC, which was a corporation, and the WFC, which was an association should be combined into one corporate structure. In addition, in 1967, the Building Committee decided to present a proposal to the Chancellor for a project to redo the entire WFC with the plan that the club members raise $80,000, that the Regents give $80,000, and also loan $80,000 to the club to pay for the estimated cost of the changes proposed by the Building Committee Chairman and the representative of the Architects and Engineers Office.

The items covered in this estimate were those listed in the letter which was sent to the voting members over the five signatures at the time that the proposal was sent out this January by the Board of Directors. This would have involved a complete refurbishing and redoing of the club house - changes of the bedrooms, adding of bathrooms, and extensive redecoration (the estimate of $240,000, which was made in 1967, is the item mentioned at the December meeting which is now, with the rising costs, estimated at $350,000.) So the WFC started simultaneously to discuss in the Ad Hoc committee to study the problems of the two clubs while carrying on at the same time the project to raise money for a complete renovation of the WFC house.

The Chancellor agreed to the WFC proposal for a fund raising campaign and also on the proposal to the Regents for a gift and loan, with the understanding that the WFC money raising project would not conflict with the University's Centennial fund raising, which went on in 1967 and 1968. During the next two years, a great many members of the club participated in fund raising and in soliciting funds from the members and others, and a great deal of time and energy went into these enterprises. Unfortunately from all these efforts, only $38,000 was raised, of which $11,000 came from the Building Committee. Approximately $11,000 was spent on the renovation of the dining room in 1968 and roughly $10,000 on repairs to the kitchen from donation funds. There is now, the Treasurer reports, approximately $17,000 left in this fund, exclusive of $1,000 in unfulfilled pledges.

During part of this period, we had a very efficient food service manager, who did not live in the building. She was bothered by the maintenance on the building, and complained steadily about leaks in our "old building." Her main interest was in the dining room where she did an excellent job. In September of 1968, we employed another manager who worked very hard to give us good food, but who, unfortunately, incurred continuous loss over a period of time of around $10,000. In the spring of 1970 he left because of illness. Since then we have had managers who have managed to keep us in the black, so that our current financial records indicate that we have been steadily operating in the black and even accumulating a modest surplus.

By the end of 1969, it seemed quite clear that not only could the club members not raise the $80,000 but because of the budgetary situation, the gift and loan would be difficult to obtain. Thus the project of redoing the club house was given up. The Ad Hoc Committee which had continued to meet during this period, focused then its attention to the proposed combination of the two clubs.

During the activities of the Ad Hoc Committee, a professional food service person was employed and paid for by the Office of the Chancellor to examine the two food services. Out of this examination came the proposal that the MFC should hire Manning and many changes were made in the WFC because of the suggestions made by the consultant. I wrote you a letter after the annual meeting in 1970, giving you some of the committee findings, although from some of the questions at the annual meeting, it appeared I didn't give enough information. The idea of redoing the WFC clubhouse was given up for the combination of the two clubs, under one facility. The Ad Hoc Committee tried to include in their deliberations anything which was suggested by any member as a possible proposal. It is understandable that all of the members who have served on the Ad Hoc in the last 3 $\frac{1}{2}$ years feel that they have worked hard, and it is unfortunate that so many of our members feel that they have not had complete and full information on the deliberations.

At the moment the best estimate which it is possible for us to get of the things which need to be done in the clubhouse (not all the desirable ones) is somewhere between $60,000 to $85,000. This estimate includes the sprinkler system, termite repairs, some repairs in the electrical system (in addition to those which were already made) and some repairs in the heating and plumbing systems which still present us with problems.

At the annual meeting the members voted for a committee of five to prepare a proposal for a combination agreeable to both clubs, using the men's club house as the main clubhouse, but retaining the WFC for multi-use. (The latter was included in a proposal by the Prytanean Alumnae, Inc.) The multi-use might include a Center for continuing educational needs of women, as well as some of the activities of the WFC. The committee of five has been appointed and has already had one meeting, and is planning to meet every week.

The committee members are:

Elizabeth Scott

Margaret Uridge

Katherine Stauffer

Mary Ann Johnson

Ruth N. Donnelly, chairman

Any of the committee members would welcome any suggestions that you have to add to their deliberations.

The committee of three to work with the Prytanean Alumnae on their proposal has as members:

May Dornin

Grace Reinman

Harriette Nicowenger

These two committees will prepare proposals promptly which can be sent to you for your consideration and vote.

I have every hope that with the help of all members, we will be able to arrive at a happy solution to our many problems. It is our great desire to have all of you participate with any suggestions; and I urge you to give them to the members of either of these committees.

Dear Chancellor Bowker:

This letter formally authorizes the Berkeley Campus to expend up to $600,000 of fund previously pledged (see Peter Haas' letter of March 21, 1968) and donated to the Berkeley Centennial Fund by the "Levi Strauss Associates" for the purpose of renovating ($400,000) and expanding ($200,000) the Faculty Club in accordance with descriptions previously submitted to Levi Strauss Associates and approved by The Regents of the University of California.

PROFESSOR JOSEPH GARBARINO:

Re: Faculty Club Proposals

Attached are the three proposals which were submitted to the donors to secure their allocation of funds previously contributed to the Berkeley Centennial Fund. Please note that the two projects totaling $600,000 for the Faculty Club remodeling and addition were accepted and approved by the donors, but the Women's Education Center proposal was not accepted and approved.

The Regents' action in May permitted us to seek a final agreement from the donors to these plans; and in the fall of 1971, a letter of authorization was finally consummated.

Chancellor Heyns, in his transmittal letter, said to the donors, "I think there is a wonderful kind of logic to having the major focus of the gift be the improvement of the faculty club and facility, and hope you do too. The Haas family is already identified with an extraordinary gift to student life. Now comes a generous contribution to the life of the faculty. It comes right after a recent national tribute to the faculty's distinction and will be another enormous boost to faculty morale."

A final word: While we attempted to be as specific as possible in the proposal drafting, we said verbally to the Haas family that there may be some minor changes in the project elements as we moved forward with more specific planning and as the Men's and Women's Faculty Clubs had a chance to absorb the impact of this most generous gift. While minor changes could be made, any major revision would certainly have to be discussed with the donors so they can be assured that their objective of aiding and supporting the faculty would be achieved.

I hope these items will be helpful and will expedite the development of this project.

Attachments: Proposals (3)

bcc: Vice Chancellor Campbell

For decades the Berkeley Campus of the University of California has struggled, against the odds of great size, to maintain some sense of community. The Berkeley Campus is at once spectacular in appearance and yet so physically diffuse as to impair an easy association by members of the University community.

The faculty is unquestionably the central ingredient in the greatness of this institution. Their unselfish efforts and commitment to the University of California, often through turbulent times, have added immeasurably to the knowledge and well-being of humankind.

We now propose that $400,000 be allocated for the purpose of extensively remodeling and redecorating the Men's Faculty Club and to facilitate, thereby, the creation of a single University Club to serve both faculty and staff. This proposal anticipates that the Men's Faculty Club and the Women's Faculty Club will soon conclude a merger agreement. (Negotiations are now well along.) The conversion of the Men's Faculty Clubhouse into a University Club would accomplish several highly important purposes. First and foremost, it would provide the campus community -- and especially the faculty -- with a handsome setting for meeting and dining together. The symbolic value of the gift to the faculty for this purpose far exceeds the actual cost involved. Second, this gift will make available considerable space now occupied by the Women's Faculty Club for other much-needed uses by women on the campus.

The kinds of renovation and refurbishing that have been suggested by the Campus Architect, in consultation with a faculty committee, are described as follows:

A handsome bridge or ramp would be constructed from ground level at the south of the Clubhouse to the deck now adjoining the second floor reading room. This in effect will create a dramatic new main entrance to the Club. The present reading room would be developed into a new lounge with new furnishings, flooring, wall finishes, lighting, and the necessary repairs. The deck, rails, and doors outside the new lounge would be renovated. The "Buck Suite" and other bedrooms would be converted into a sitting room, men's and women's toilets and powder room. Office space would be enlarged.

New lighting would be installed throughout the Club. All new furnishings would be provided for the Club. Parking space is badly deficient at present, so additional parking would be provided as well as adequately lighted paths to the new entrance and appropriate landscaping. Outdoor dining space would be enlarged. A food service line would be installed. All fees for building and furniture, plans, specifications, inspection, and other costs would be included.

In sum, the Men's Faculty Clubhouse, a structurally sound and distinguished work of architecture, would be redeemed through the generosity of the Haas family and transformed into an elegant center for the University community.

Women's Education Center

Background: The emerging status of women in our society and their needs for higher education require new means of access to and completion of advanced study and training. The impact of technology on the labor force and homemaking responsibilities and related changes in family life have freed women for fuller use of their intellectual abilities and productive capacities. However, the educational process of women terminates or is interrupted at various junctures throughout their lives, but by no means is the need lessened for completion of their education. Recently, national studies have pointed out the desirability for some men and women to interrupt their education and then continue it in acceptable and recognized programs. Many women enter or re-enter their careers at a period later in their lives than do most men; consequently, they come to the University with a great deal more maturity but with less understanding and knowledge about how they can complete their education and use their knowledge in the working world.

Proposal: A Women's Education Center is proposed for the Berkeley campus to meet the diverse and special needs of more mature women who wish to enter the University initially or who seek to continue their education through one or more of its various avenues. The W.E.C. would have the following functions:

- A. Guidance: The Center would offer guidance to women through available library resources on career and educational opportunities, staff and volunteers and other devices which could be selected by the applicants to meet their needs for information and direction.
- B. Facilitation: The Center would assist women applicants to secure entrance to the University or obtain the necessary preparation for eventual entrance to the University, and to help facilitate their obtaining the necessary credits for past experience which might be just as valid but not conforming exactly to University rules and regulations. It would seek intelligent and humane application of University rules and procedures to meet the changing conditions as posed by more mature women.
- C. Research: The Center would encourage, coordinate and sometimes undertake specific research activities dealing with women's continuing education and its application. In the initial stages the emphasis would be on stimulating research by other agencies and units of the University and the surrounding community.
- D. Communication: The Center would undertake programs of communication and information by conducting workshops and conferences about problems of women. This function would seek to enlarge the general knowledge in this area among a variety of individuals and groups. The emphasis would be on dissemination of information to groups rather than the above-mentioned function of guidance which focuses on specific individuals and their concerns.

- E. Development of Financial Aid: The Center would seek to encourage greater numbers of fellowships, scholarships, and grant-in-aids for the purpose of aiding women to return to the University. These funds would be administered through the normal University channels.
- F. Informal Relationships: The Center, through its offices, conference facilities and guidance, would naturally evolve as a vehicle through which individuals could meet others who have similar problems and concerns and thus provide personal interaction which would be supportive to individual efforts.

Staffing: The Center would require in the first two years a half-time director, a full-time administrative assistant--advisor, and a full-time secretary--bookkeeper--receptionist. These three individuals would staff the permanent functions and would seek to encourage high level participation by qualified volunteers from various women's organizations and groups connected or involved with the campus such as the Prytanean Alumnae Association, the Women's Faculty Club, the Berkeley Women's Faculty Group, faculty wives, etc.

Physical Facilities: The Center would require a minimum of three offices, a combination conference-library-lounge room, a guidance and advising room and reception area with prospects for expansion as the program enlarges and the number of individuals served increases. Such facilities would become available in the Women's Faculty Clubhouse when that organization and the Men's Faculty Club, stimulated by the gift of the Haas Family, consolidate their operations in the remodeled and re-decorated facility now operated by the Men's Faculty Club.

Financing: To get this program started, the major cost would be the rehabilitation and remodeling of the Women's Faculty Club, estimated at $75,000.

The operating costs for the first year are estimated at $25,000. The budget in subsequent years would be met by a variety means. For example, the Prytanean Alumnae, Inc. is exploring ways to make available some of its capital assets over a period of four or five years. Some of the services provided by the Center may be reimbursed by fees. As the Center continues, its activities will generate interest on the part of foundations and individuals who could be appealed to for support either on the basis of specific project grants or outright gifts.

Summary: Rehabilitation of Women's Faculty Club	$ 75,000.00
Operating costs for one year	25,000.00
	$100,000.00

In undertaking a project of this type the University would be joining hands with other institutions which have recognized this need and have established similar useful centers. Each one of these centers has different characteristics due to its location, staffing, and institutional needs. Preliminary explorations of the need for this type of center at Berkeley have indicated that there will be an overwhelming acceptance of the concept of such a center and very extensive use of its services.

University Club Dining Facilities

The Need

In view of the proposed remodeling of the Men's Faculty Club to produce a handsome new University Club with a broadened membership base (as described elsewhere in detail), there no doubt will be an upsurge in the use of this facility. While the remodeled area will accommodate a slightly enlarged flow of people, the Club will soon require additional dining facilities. A handsome new dining facility would reduce any over-crowding and would enhance significantly the gracious atmosphere created through the Haas Family gift.

The new dining wing would consist of 4,000 square feet. The wing would be extended from the east side of the present club and would be contiguous to what is now the main serving area.

Estimated Cost

The estimated total cost of this addition is approximately $200,000. The budget for the facility includes structure, access, serving area, furniture, fees, plans, specifications and all other costs.

PROPOSED PRINCIPLES FOR THE JOINT OPERATION OF THE FACULTY CLUBS *

Background

At the present time the Men's Faculty Club has a combined Active and Associate membership of approximately 1,100. Dues are graduated by academic rank with about 60 percent of the membership paying $7.50 a month, about 15 percent paying $6.00 a month, and the remainder paying $2.00 a month. Total dues income amounts to approximately $6,200 a month.

The Women's Faculty Club has a combined membership of approximately 450 in the Active and Associate categories plus a few graduate students. Dues are $3.50 a month for Active, $3.00 a month for Associates, and $1.00 a month for graduate students, with total dues income amounting to about $1,550 per month.

Principles of the Combined Operation

It is proposed to conduct a Combined Operation of the two clubs for a trial period not to exceed two years from the effective date of the combination. It is understood that, if the combined operation proves satisfactory, the long-term goal will be the creation of a merged organization with a single set of categories of membership and a single dues structure.

The combined operation would be operated under the following set of principles during the trial period:

1. The present corporate structure of the two Clubs would be maintained. The financial assets and liabilities of each Club as of the effective date would not be affected by the combined operation except that any accounts receivable or payable from current operations as of the effective date would be the responsibility of the separate clubs.

2. Each Club would retain title to its dues and initiation fee income, income from investments, and other income that might accrue from occasional individual Club-sponsored events that might be held in the facilities (e.g. the Men's Club Christmas party, art sales, etc.) during the period of combined operations except as noted below.

Beginning with the effective date of the combined operation, the Women's Faculty Club would transfer one-half of its current dues and initiation fee income each month to the Combined Operations in fulfillment of their financial obligations under the combined operation. All income from operations of the present Club buildings, garage, etc., will also accrue to the Combined Operation as it is earned. The Men's Club will manage the Combined Operation, which will assume responsibility for all expenses incurred in the conduct of those activities in both Club. Buildings that are related to activities of either Faculty Club. This includes current expenses, maintenance, insurance, taxes and other costs necessary for the Clubs' share of operating expenses.

If for any reason either Club building cannot be used as a residence facility at substantially the same level as it has in the past for a period of more than two months during the term of this agreement, the financial arrangements for the joint operation contained herein shall be reviewed and appropriately modified.

3. The Men's Club will house the administrative and regular food preparation services and the Combined Operation staff will provide the necessary support for billing and dues collection from the members, of both Clubs. Meal service may be provided by special arrangement in the Women's Club if such service is economically feasible. At the end of six months of joint operation, the operating experience will be reviewed by the Governing Board.

4. A Current Operating Committee made up of two members, one representing each Club, would advise the Manager of the Combined Operations on current operating questions. Each Club will name an alternate to their regular member to insure that a representative will be available to make decisions. The committee would work with general policy direction from the Governing Board of the Combined Operation. If the Operating Committee is unable to reach agreement on an issue, the question would be submitted to the Governing Board of the combined facilities for decision.

5. Overall policy for Combined Operation will be developed by a Governing Board for the joint operation. This board will be made up of nine members, divided between representatives of the Men's and Women's Club according to the approximate ratio of Active and Associate members of the two Clubs. (At present, this would mean six Men's Club and three Women's Club representatives.) It would be expected that most issues could be decided by consensus, but in the event of an impasse, it would be understood that in questions involving the use and arrangements of the present Men's Club facilities appropriate weight would be given to the majority position of the Men's Club members, and that in questions involving the use and arrangements of the Women's Club building, appropriate weight would be given the majority position of the Women's Club representatives.

6. It is understood that a substantial sum of money might be available to the Faculty Clubs to aid in the development of the concept of the combined and expanded operation. If funding becomes available, it is understood that there will be a general refurbishing and improving of the Men's Club building (including the development of an attractive, upgraded lounge and associated facilities) and repair and conversion of the Women's Club building to multi-purpose use such as residence facilities and a women's center.

7. Every attempt will be made to provide opportunities for staff of the Women's Club to transfer to the service staff of the Combined Operation. Adequate notice of cessation of operations will be provided other employees of the Women's Club and the Clubs' management will consult jointly on means to minimize the effect of the combination on present employees.

July 6, 1972

Dear Members,

I realize it has been some time since I have written you concerning club matters. Several items have been pending and I have been awaiting their resolution before writing.

First and possibly foremost in your minds concerns the operation of our clubhouse. The plan for the first six months of joint operation did not work out as well as originally intended. The major faults seemed to be the lack of supervision of work being done at our building and certain failures in communication between management, employees, and residents. Consequently, the Joint Operating Committee after studying the financial and managerial aspects of the problem has started on a different arrangement as of July 1, 1972. The following points explain the present system:

1. As of July 1, 1972, the representatives of the Women's Faculty Club on the Joint Operating Committee will assume complete responsibility for the operation and the staffing of the women's club building.
2. All the income generated by the rental and other sources related to the women's building will be available for operation of the clubhouse. All the expenses of operation, both current and the fixed overhead expenses, will be the responsibility of the Women's Faculty Club. Any surplus or deficit will be the responsibility of the Women's Faculty Club.
3. The accounting and other record keeping required by the Women's Faculty Club as part of the Joint Operation in connection with the operation of our clubhouse will continue to be provided by the Joint Operation.

In keeping with the above points we are continuing Mrs. Curtis as manager and Mrs. Gordon Britland in the office. Mrs. Curtis is presently making the arrangements for the other staffing needs of our building.

Another announcement I am sure most of you will be glad to hear is that Manning's has been given two month's notice. After September 1, 1972, Mr. Walters, The Faculty Club manager, will supervise the food service. This move should result in better food service and less financial overhead. Along this same line the Faculty Club has been granted a liquor license. The effective date for bar service will be announced as soon as the details are worked out.

Some renovation work and refurbishing will be starting in our building in the near future. Bids for the work have been received and requisitions are in the process of being prepared for phase I (interior painting, rugs, window shades, and some furniture). Phase II (drapes, exterior painting, necessary electrical and plumbing, etc.) will also be arranged for shortly.

Some of you may not know that we had two resignations from the Board of Directors, Barbara Bolen and Barbara Hoepner. I am pleased to announce that Betsy Mills has been appointed to the board and has been elected the Treasurer. Katherine Stauffer has also accepted appointment to the board and will be serving as the Membership Chairman. We are most fortunate to have such fine replacements and appreciate their willingness to serve. We also appreciate greatly the many hours of service that Barbara Bolen and Barbara Hoepner gave to the club.

We recently received notice of the recipients of the Lucy Ward Stebbins Scholarships for 1972-1973. They are Jan Kathleen Gamr, a senior in Psychology, and Jean Marie Heidelberger, a junior in French.

Should you have any question regarding the club operations please refer them to Ruth Donnelly during July. I shall be out of town until the end of the month. Here's wishing all of you a most pleasant summer.

Sincerely,

Mary Lou Norrie
President, Board of Directors.

*Progress Report of review before this meeting
Hastily - [signature]*

I. Committee organization:

A. The Board of Directors at the November 1, 1972 meeting, voted as follows:

- " That a new committee, similar to the Committee of Five, 1971, be appointed to prepare and present a statement of what the Women's Faculty Club proposes for a merger, pointing out the present unsatisfactory situation. This proposal to be sent to the Women's Faculty Club members before the Annual Meeting, to be voted upon there. Also, that recommendations for revision of the By-Laws be made to omit any reference to the sex of members."

Three Board members were appointed: Margaret Uridge, chairman; Colette Seiple, and Martha Stumpf. Two non-Board members were later appointed by President Mary Lou Norrie. They were: Roberta Park and Dorothy Randolph. President Norrie to be an ex-officio member and Henry Poppic to be legal advisor to the Committee was also approved.

B. Meetings:

The Committee has met five times to date, with the first meeting held Thursday, November 16th. Mr. Poppic attended the third meeting, November 28th, and Vice-Chancellor Kerley the fourth meeting Nov. 30th.

C. The Committee had frank discussions at all meetings, exploring various proposals. These discussions were summarized in "Notes on the Meetings", prepared by the Chairman, which became a starting point for the discussion in the following meetings.

The Committee as a whole has reviewed this report and amended it as it saw fit.

II. Background information:

A. The Committee members were given copies of the following:

- 1) Letter of Pres. Mary Lou Norrie, to WFC members, of Feb. 23, 1971, as a review of the proposals for merger to that date.
- 2) "Proposed principles for the Joint Operation of the Faculty Clubs" May 25, 1971.
- 3) Letters of Oct. 17 from Joe Garbarino; Nov. 8, in answer, from M.L. Norrie; Nov. 14, in answer to that, from Joe Garbarino, Pres. of The Faculty Club.

B. Previous action on proposed merger:

- 1) January 9, 1971 Report of the Ad Hoc Committee to Study the Men's and Women's Faculty Club was voted down by the WFC membership Feb. 1971.
- 2) WFC Committee of Five legal agreement proposal for Joint Operations, dated March 29, 1971, was refused by the Men's Club representatives.
- 3) Modified "Proposed Principles of Joint Operations..." agreed to 5/25,

C. Unsatisfactory situation of the Joint Operations:

1. Accounting & Management:

- a. July 1, 1972, at suggestion of the Men's Club President, the Women's Faculty Club took over the management of the WFC building, with rentals, maintenance, etc., because of frequent complaints about lack of maintenance and concern for the up-keep of the building.
- b. November 1, 1972, again at the suggestion of the Men's Club President, Women's Faculty Club took back the billing of its own members, including the bills for meals in the Men's Club, and the WFC dues.

2. "Proposed principles of Joint Operations" not followed:

- a. Governing Board never implemented: WFC members were appointed, but those from the Men's Club were not.
- b. Manager reported to the President of the Men's Club, not to the Joint Operations Committee, & tended to ignore WFC needs.
- c. Billing operations followed By-Laws of Men's Club, with no prior agreement with WFC representatives, with their "delinquent" c

III. Proposals discussed:

A. Joint Operations continue with following points:

1. Manager reports to Joint Operations Committee, not to the Men's Club President; and thus can be fired by the Joint Operations Committee.
2. Activate, as in the agreed upon Proposals, the Joint Operations Governing Board.
3. Suggestions that an outside group make a management survey.

B. Women's Faculty Club building:

1. Maintain present character of the lounge, library & dining-room.
2. Develop long-term plans on utilization of the building, including residential and first-floor rooms use.
3. Importance of the fact that the majority of the present members of the WFC feel very strongly about the building, the members having built it and paid for it, and are now out of debt; and that there was misunderstanding about the amount of refurbishing would be paid for by the ~~new~~ gift (which did pay for the installation of sprinklers.)
4. Should be structurally joined to the Men's Faculty Club building to form a Faculty Center. The atmosphere it offers complements that of the Men's Club - neither replaces the other. The WFC lounge is especially useful for receptions.
5. Parking area - with the recommendation previously made that the new Optometry wing be built to have its proposed open court toward the WFC building.
6. Would the WFC membership vote to release the building to the University if the latter said it would be used as a symbolic center for women's activities on campus.

One suggestion being made that the Academic Women Ombudsman be located in the presently-unused room rented to the Center for Continuing Education for Women.

C. Areas of conflict in combining the two clubs into one organization:

1. Membership: Qualifications, dues, voting (WFC members run the WFC, while Men's Club Board runs theirs, even to changing By-Laws.)
2. Men's Club By-Laws that include House rules for their building.
3. Debt of the Men's Club.

D. Proposal to organize a new Corporation, called the Faculty Center:

1. Articles of incorporation to include both men and women without discrimination, and with women guaranteed to be on Board.
2. Agreement included on the payment of the Men's Club debt - out of the profits, after a proportion set-aside for a maintenance and renovation fund.
3. Membership to include a "grandfather clause" for all members of both present clubs; base of membership broadened to include administrative campus personnel and non-tenured faculty, including lecturers, and also graduate students, such as Teaching Assistants. Non-members restricted in use of the club facilities, as members' dues help to defray costs of the Center.
4. An "out-reach" program to attract the younger academics on campus.
5. Proposal that the new organization have entirely new management personnel drew considerable discussion and strong disagreement from one member of the Committee.
6. The Bar license could be transferred to the new organization, and would help to pay off the deficits from the dining-room and also the Men's Club debt.

IV: For Action:

A. Facts that need to be determined:

1. Use of the residential rooms of the WFC during last few years.
2. Use of the lounge of WFC bldg. during last few years.
3. Turn-away applicants for residential rooms at Men's Club
4. Turn-away applicants for use of special rooms at Men's Club
5. Profit & Loss Statement of WFC for several immediately past years.
6. Corporation status of Men's club. ~~WFC~~ + MFC
7. Terms of the Haas gift.

B. Implementation:

1. Ask Ruth Donnelly to determine "utilization of WFC " statistics.
2. Ask D.Keller, Josephine Smith & Betsy Mills to collect the profit & loss figures, ~~for WFC~~
3. Colette Seiple follow-through on suggestion that Vice-Chancellor's Management group could assist - possibly they could get figures of utilization of Men's Club, and their profit & loss during the Joint Operation & before; and the turn-away figures; also getting copies of the Haas gift terms.
4. Review Committee to follow-up on request to Sacramento for Articles of Incorporation of Men's Club, which Mr. Poppic had written ~~for~~ Nov. 22, 1972.

C. Preparation for a possible new organization:

1. M.L.Norrie and M.D.Uridge to draft a Constitution & By-Laws, or Articles & By-laws, to cover points recommended.

D. Committee to prepare a statement regarding the utilization of the Women's Faculty Club Building:

1. As a structural part of the proposed Faculty Center
2. As a separate building, turned over to the University ~~for use by Women.~~

E. Committee to present proposal, for the Board to present to the Membership of the Women's Faculty Club for the Annual Meeting.

THE WOMEN'S FACULTY CLUB • UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA • BERKELEY • CALIFORNIA 94720

RESOLUTION OF BOARD OF DIRECTORS
THE WOMEN'S FACULTY CLUB OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA, INC.

WHEREAS, the Board has concluded that it is in the best interests of the members of The Women's Faculty Club of the University of California, Inc. and of the Faculty Club of the University of California that the corporate entities, administration, and operation of the two Clubs should be merged into a new Club known as the "Berkeley Faculty Club", and that the merger would promote the purposes for which each of the Clubs was organized;

WHEREAS, the Board has examined the Agreement of Merger and the Terms of Merger between the Faculty Club of the University of California and The Women's Faculty Club of the University of California, Inc., and the By-Laws of the Berkeley Faculty Club presented to the Board;

NOW, THEREFORE, be it hereby

RESOLVED, that the said Agreement of Merger, the said Terms of Merger, and the said By-Laws, and each and all of their terms and conditions, are hereby approved;

FURTHER RESOLVED, that the President and Secretary are hereby authorized and directed to execute and acknowledge the said Agreement of Merger in the name of and on behalf of this corporation;

FURTHER RESOLVED, that the officers of this corporation are authorized and directed to call a special meeting of the members of this corporation for the purpose of considering and voting on the said Agreement of Merger, the said Terms of Merger, and the said By-Laws, and to seek their adoption at that meeting by a majority of the enfranchised members of this corporation, or, without calling a special meeting of the members of this corporation, to seek the written consent to the said Agreement of Merger, the said Terms of Merger, and the said By-Laws, of two-thirds of the enfranchised members of this corporation; and

FURTHER RESOLVED, that upon approval as herein provided of the said Agreement of Merger and the said Terms of Merger by the enfranchised members of this corporation, the officers of this corporation are directed to execute, acknowledge, file, and record such instruments, and perform all acts necessary or proper to effect the terms and conditions of the said Agreement of Merger and of the said Terms of Merger on behalf of this corporation.

So voted September 15, 1976 at a regularly scheduled meeting of the Board of Directors of The Women's Faculty Club of the University of California, Inc.

STATEMENT AGAINST THE PROPOSED MERGER

Because the President of the Women's Faculty Club has received a number of letters arguing against the merger, she has appointed a committee to summarize these arguments. (The original letters may be seen in the Women's Faculty Club office, or copies will be sent to members requesting them.)

The arguments are both general and specific. In general, the argument is that merger is too extreme a form of what the Regents in 1971 called "agreement to consolidate the management operations of the Women's Faculty Club and the Faculty Club," as a contingency: acceptance of the gift from the Strauss Associates. Further, the effort at "Joint Operation" in 1972 though unsuccessful, is held by the Faculty Club to have satisfied this requirement. The feeling now is that the merger is too obliterative of the separate identities of the two clubs, and that homogenization is as antiquated as total separation. Some form of shared membership and cooperative campus service is suggested, without the sacrifice of the Women's Faculty Club's own characteristic spirit and life-style which the concept of merger entails.

Specifically, there are four arguments:

- 1) That the Women's Faculty Club should not take on the Faculty Club's dues and assessment, and voting structure and their membership limitations.
- 2) That the Women's Faculty Club should not take on or become a part of the Faculty Club's book-keeping and accounting system, but should keep its own separate accounts, whatever the cooperative methods to be established.
- 3) That the Women's Faculty Club should not take on the Faculty Club's assets and liabilities.
- 4) That the Women's Faculty Club should not take on the Faculty Club's management procedures which are counter to the Women's Faculty Club spirit and life-style, in establishing of tone, in treatment of personnel, and in many other ways demonstrated in the 1972 experiment.

In sum, that the concept of cooperation rather than that of merger would make possible, without loss of identity, the greater amount of service to the campus community.

A F I N A N C I A L W A R N I N G

Did any of those who signed the 142 affirmative proxies stop to think of the effect upon their personal finances if the terms of the merger committee were adopted?

Adoption of these terms would lay each member open, individually, to whatever assessment the Board of Directors of the Faculty Club decided to levy. And in addition to this and to the $800 per annum which The Women's Faculty Club is requested to provide toward the interest on the Faculty Club's debt, there is the Faculty Club's notably large debt itself.

An assessment is not just some vague threat which may happen in the future. It happened to the members of the Faculty Club three months ago. The income was not sufficient to cover the expenses plus the interest and payment on the debt. The result was that each member was assessed $10. Such assessment can happen at any time in the future.

At the present time, and with our present set-up, no member of The Women's Faculty Club can be assessed, nor can the officers or individual members of the Club be sued in a court of law. But if the membership of The Women's Faculty Club be merged with that of the Faculty Club, the individual members of each can be assessed at whatever time and in whatever amount the Board of Directors of the Faculty Club may, in its wisdom, decide.

The question of assessment is a very minor matter compared to the shared responsibility for the Faculty Club's large debt. The terms of the merger committee call for the consolidation of the assets and liabilities of both clubs. The Women's Faculty Club has no debt - only assets. The Faculty Club has a very large debt and would, naturally, like control not only of our assets, but would like The Women's Faculty Club to share responsibility for their debt as well. If the terms of the merger are adopted, we are then open to assessment, and also for the financial responsibility when it comes to repayment of the debt.

According to the Balance Sheet of the Faculty Club, rendered by Haskins and Sells as of June 30, 1976, the "Long Term Debt" stands, as of that date at $178,143. The agreement calls for "Annual Installments of $17,187 including interest to 1990". According to the statement, it was this installment which the Faculty Club was not able to meet - hence, the "special assessment of $14,400" shown in the first item on page 3 of the Financial Report.

(Note: There are several items in this report open to critical inspection but it is not pertinent to the general subject to call attention to them here. However, it should be noted that at any time the Faculty Club fails to meet its quota, assessment, levied on the members, will be the inevitable result.)

There seems to have been a "conspiracy of silence" in failing to mention the amount of this debt. It can be understood why the Faculty Club might not wish to announce the total at this stage of the game. But WHY did not The Women's Faculty Club's Board of Directors ascertain the exact amount of the debt, and its terms. They knew of its existence. WHY was this total not mentioned in the material sent out to the membership for vote? especially since the Board was recommending the merger "in the best interest" of the Club? Is it "in the best interest" for the members to assume a financial responsibility of this size? To ask the membership to assume responsibility without telling them either the amount concerned, or the terms of the debt, seems unbelievable.

Do you really think that "progress" (so-called) and "the best interests of the Club" are served by opening our members to assessment and individual assumption of share in the Faculty Club's debt?

Since it has been proposed to hand all control of every sort over to the manager of the Faculty Club and with a 2:1 ratio on the proposed governing board, any protest that we could make would not have the slightest chance of being heard.

FACE THE FACTS. VOTE WITH YOUR EYES OPEN.
